✻✻✻✻ I T was expected, after Cæsar and ✻✻✻✻ the Venetians had laid down their ✻✻✻✻ Arms, and all Occasions for a War of the King of France against Cæsar and the Catholic King were removed, that Italy, which had been afflicted and broken by such a Multitude of Calamities, would have enjoyed Rest for some Years; and more especially since the Swiss, who are a powerful Instrument in the Hands of one who delights in Broils and Disturbances, appeared to be reconciled and to have renewed their antient Friendship with the King of France, without lessening on that Account their Attachments to the other Princes. And so hopeful was the Prospect of Affairs from the Convention made at Noyon, that, for establishing a greater Harmony between the two Kings, it was contrived they should have an Interview at Cambray, whither Cheures, the Grand

It was then, not without just Reason, imagined that Peace and Agreement between such powerful Princes must have crushed all the Seeds of War and Discord in Italy. And yet, either through the Unhappiness of our Fate, or because, Italy being divided into so many Principalities and States, it was next to impossible, on account of the various Inclinations and Interests of her Rulers, that she should not be subjected to continual Disquietudes, lo! hardly had Cæsar and the Venetians laid down their Arms, and even before the Consignment of the City of Verona, fresh Tumults began to arise. The Author of these Disturbances was Francesco Maria dalla Rovere, who had solicited the Spanish Foot that had served in Verona, and in the French and Venetian Army about that City, to assist him in the Recovery of the States from which he had that same Summer been driven by the Pontiff. He found it very easy to persuade them, since to foreign Soldiers, accustomed in Wars to the Plundering of Towns, and to the Ravaging of Countries, nothing was more distasteful than the Peace to which all the Affairs of Italy, they saw, had a manifest Tendency.

THE Duke then drew together about Five Thousand Spanish Foot, the Chief of whom was Maldonato, a Man of the same Nation, and exercised in many Wars: To these were joined about Eight Hundred light Horse under the Command of Federigo da Bozzolo, Gajoso a Spaniard, Zuccherro a Burgundian, and Andrea Bua and Costatino Buccola, Albanians, all experienced Officers, and of no mean Reputation in Arms. But the most esteemed among them all by far, both for the Nobility of his House, and for the Rank which even from his tender Years he had held in the Military, was Federigo da Gonzaga Lord of Bozzolo, who had been one of the most efficacious Agents in persuading this Conjunction junction of Forces, being induced not only by a Desire of increasing his Renown in the Exercise of Arms by new Wars, and by his intimate Friendship with Francesco Maria, but also by the Hatred which he had conceived against Lorenzo de' Medici. For when the Command of all the Military of the Church and of the Florentines was transferred to Lorenzo on account of the Sickness of his Uncle Giuliano, he had refused Federigo the Post of Commander in chief of the Foot, which had been granted him before by Giuliano. This Army then, which was much more to be esteemed for its Valour than for its Number, or Preparations for maintaining a War, for it was not furnished with Money, Artillery, nor Ammunition, nor, except Horses and Arms, with any of those great Provisions with which Armies are usually attended, set out on its March for the State of Urbino on the same Day that the City of Verona was consigned to the Venetians.

his State.

ON the first Intelligence of the Motion of these Troops the Pope was mightily A 4 disturbed;

A. D. 1517. disturbed; for he considered the Quality of the Army, which was formidable for the Hatred of the Generals, and for the Bravery and Reputation of the Spanish Foot. He knew the Inclination that the People of the Dutchy of Urbino bore towards Francesco Maria, because they had been a long Time under the gentle Government of the House of Montefeltro, their Affection to which they had transferred on him, who had his Education in that State, and was born of a Sister of Duke Guido. Besides this, it was a sad Vexation to the Pontiff that he was to go to War against an Army which had nothing to lose, and was put in Motion only by a Desire of Plunder and Rapine, by the Sweetness of which he was afraid that Multitudes of Soldiers, who by the Peace were left without Means for gaining a Subsistence, might be tempted to join them. But what above all tormented his Mind was a Jealousy that this Movement was made with the Participation of the King of France; for, besides knowing that the War against Francesco Maria had displeased the King, he was conscious to himself that that he had given him many Occasions A. D. 1517. to be dissatisfied with him; as, for Instance, by not observing, when Cæsar descended into Lombardy, the Confederacy made after the Acquisition of Milan; by having, after his Return to Rome, sent him a Bull concerning the Collation of Benefices in the Kingdom of France, and Dutchy of Milan, which, being of a different Tenor from what was agreed by the Convention made in Bologna, that for Want of Time had not been subscribed, the King in Anger refused to accept; by carrying on secret Negotiations with the other Princes, and with the Swiss against him; by having not long before, out of a Desire to prevent directly the Recovery of Verona, permitted the Spanish Foot, that marched from Naples to relieve it, to pass separately through the State of the Church, alledging in Excuse that he was not willing to give them Occasion to pass in a Body, because he was not able to resist them; by his not granting him, according to his Promise made in Bologna, the Tenth, but on intricate Conditions; and by his not restoring the Towns to the Duke of Ferrara, Pope suspicious of the King of France and Venetians.

A. D. 1517. rara. These Reasons gave him just Cause to suspect the Intentions of the King; but he fancied he saw others yet more convincing. The Dispositions for this Movement being made in the Neighbourhood of Verona, it was impossible but it must, many Days before it was set on Foot, have come to the Knowledge of Lautrech, and as he kept it secret, it might be presumed to be undertaken with the King's Consent. To this it was added, that Federigo da Bozzolo had been till that present in the King's Pay, nor did it appear to be true, what Lautrech pleaded in Excuse, that the Term of his Service was expired. The Pontiff was also jealous of the Inclinations of the Venetians, whose Proveditors were said to have been concerned in assembling these Troops, that Senate, on the Memory of past Transactions, being dissatisfied with him, and uneasy at his Greatness, because he had succeeded to the Pontificate when it was at such a Height of Power and Reputation, and could dispose of the Florentine State at Pleasure.

ALL these Apprehensions served to terrify the Pope, while he had no Hopes or Encouragement from his Friendship or Alliances with the other Princes, for, besides their having newly either made Peace or Confederacies with the King of France, there was not one of them but was disgusted with his Manner of Proceeding by secret Counsels and Artifices, in which, though he might have been inclined to their Party, yet by shewing a Reluctance to discover himself, and a Slowness in putting his Intentions in Execution, and performing his Promises, he had given but little Satisfaction to any of them, nay, was frequently afraid of them all; and therefore had very lately sent Frier Nicolas, a German, and Secretary to the Cardinal de' Medici, to the Catholic King, to dissuade him from the Interview which was in Agitation between him and the King of France, being apprehensive of a closer Alliance between these two Princes, which might tend to his Prejudice. In this doubtful and perplexed State of Mind neither he nor his Nephew Lorenzo ceased continually continually sending Troops into Romagna, partly new Levies, and partly Detachments from the Florentine standing Regiments, that so joining with Renzo da Ceri and Vitello, who were with the Men at Arms at Ravenna, they might oppose the Passage of the Enemy. But this Design was prevented by the Expeditionness of the Enemy's March, who passing the Po at Ostia, had crossed the Territory of Bologna by the Way of Cento and Butrio, and were entered into the Dominions of the Duke of Ferrara, from whence they proceeded, and after sacking Granarolo, a Castle in the Faventine, came before Faenza, in order to try whether the Name of a Youth of the Family of the Manfredi, who was in their Army, could excite the Faventines to endeavour at a Change, But all Things continuing very quiet in the City they passed forwards without making any other Attempt on the Towns of Romagna, which had all Garrisons; either of Men at Arms or of Foot, and for the better Security of Rimini, Renzo and Vitello were gone thither by Sea. Lorenzo proceeded to Cesena, to assemble there there and at Rimini his Forces; but the A. D.

Enemy being advanced forwards he ceased not in the mean time to enlist Soldiers in many Places, which abounded with them in greater Numbers than he wanted or even desired. For Twenty-five Hundred German Foot, and above Four Thousand Gascons, being dismissed by Lautrech, and about to return to their own Country, Giovanni da Poppi, Secretary to Lorenzo, and his Agent for several Months with Lautrech, either out of a vain Suspicion that their Infantry, being out of Pay, would follow Francesco Maria, or persuading himself, on slight Grounds, that the War might soon be brought to a happy Issue with these Forces, enlisted them by his own Authority, making Use of the Authority of Lautrech with the principal Officers, and immediately put them in Motion towards Bologna; so that the Pontiff, and Lorenzo, who, on account of the Suspicion they had of the King, were highly dissatisfied at this presumptuous Step of Poppi, had no Room to refuse them, for fear that after they had proceeded thus far they would join with their Enemies.

1517.

IN the mean time Francesco Maria proceeded forwards, and entering the State of Urbino was every where received with great Joy by the People, not a Soldier being found in the Towns; for Lorenzo not having had Time to provide for so many Places, had only taken Care for the Defence of the City of Urbino, the Seat and Capital of the Dutchy; and for this Purpose, by Advice of Vitello, he had sent thither Two Thousand Foot from Citta di Castello, and in the Room of Vitello, who refused to go, had appointed Giacomo Rosssetto of Citta di Castello to conduct them. That Officer being by many advised, because the People were by no means to be trusted, to drive all who were able to bear Arms out of the City, refused to do it. Francesco Maria therefore, without Loss of Time, marched directly to Urbino, and though his first Approach to the Walls was unsuccessful, yet on his coming before them a second Time Giacomo Rosssetto agreed to surrender him the Town, induced either by Unfaithfulness, as many believed, or by Fear of the People, who were all in an Uproar, the Duke.

Uproar, for he had no Reason to be afraid A. D. unprovided with Artillery, and all other Necessaries for a Siege. The Garrison marched out with Safety to their Persons and Effects according to the Capitulation, but Bishop Vitello, who had governed that State in the Name of the new Duke, and under whom nothing seemed to have succeeded prosperously, remained Prisoner.

The Example of Urbino was followed by the whole State, except San Leo, which being very strong by Situation was defended by a small Garrison. The Citizens of Agobbio, which had at first declared for the Duke, and afterwards repenting themselves had returned to the Obedience of Lorenzo, seeing such a Train of Success, did the same as the rest of the Towns.
Pesaro, Sinigaglia, Gradata and Mondaino, Towns separate from the Dutchy, remained in the Power of Lorenzo.

FRANCESCO MARIA after the Recovery of Urbino applied his Thoughts to make himself Master of some of the maritime Places, and because Pesaro and Sinigaglia had

A. D. had numerous Garrisons, having made a 1517. Feint to march to Pesaro, he turned towards Fano, a City usually in a worse State of Defence, and having never been in Subjection to him was the less afraid of him.
 But Renzo da Ceri, who was at Pesaro, having Notice of his Design, immediately ordered to Fano Troilo Savello with an Hundred Men at Arms and Six Hundred Foot. The Enemy approached the Place with five Pieces of Artillery, not very large, which they had found in Urbino, and being in Want also of Powder, they had made a Breach in the Wall of not above twenty Braces, and that with Difficulty, yet they stormed the Place, but were repulsed with the Loss of about an Hundred and Fifty Men. Undaunted, however, they gave a fresh Assault the next Day, and with such Vigour that the Breach was in a manner abandoned, and they would without Doubt have entered the Town, had it not been for the Valour of Fabiano da Gallese, Lieutenant to Troilo, who maintaining his Post at the Wall with a few Men at Arms, performed Wonders in its Defence, and repulsed the Enemy.

They

They would have given another Assault ^{A. D.} the next Day, but being informed that ^{1517.} Five Hundred Men from Pesaro had entered the Place by Sea in the Night, they decamped and went and posted themselves at Castello di Monte Baroccio, seated on a very high Mountain, and very strong by Situation, from whence the Descent is easy towards Fossombrone and Urbino, but difficult and very rugged towards Pesaro. By remaining in this Post, as they had at present no Opportunity to employ their Arms to better Purpose, they covered the Dutchy of Urbino which lay behind them.

ON the other Side the German and Gascon Foot, with great Numbers besides of Italian Foot taken into Pay, and Fifteen Hundred German Foot of those who had lain in Garrison at Verona, arrived at Rimini, where Lorenzo de' Medici had his Quarters, and where almost the whole Cavalry of the Pope and of the Florentines was also assembled. Lorenzo, who being unexperienced in War was directed by the Advice of the Generals, advanced with his Men at Arms to Pesaro, and

VOL. VII. B ordered

Situation City of Pesaro is seated at the Entrance of Pesaro. of a Valley, that extends itself towards Urbino, and gives Passage to a River, which is called by the Inhabitants Porto, because in that Place it is navigable for Barks, and runs near the City on the Side towards Ri- mini. The Castle is towards the Sea, and between the River and the City are a Multitude of Warehouses, which for the Security of the Town Renzo had demolished. A great Part of the City is furrounded on all Sides by Mountains, which reach not to the Sea, but between them and the Sea leave some Space for a Plain, which on the Side towards Fano is two Miles in Breadth ; and on the Downs are two Hills one over against another, of which that towards the Sea is called Candelara, and the other, towards Urbino, Nugolara, and on the Top of each of these Hills is a Castle of the same Name with the Hill. Now the Italian Foot were posted at the Castle of Candelara, and the Germans and Gascons at that of Nugolara, next to the Enemy, fight, unless it were in slight Skirmishes, A. D. but to prevent them from ranging the 1517.

 Country at Liberty, or undertaking any Enterprize. For the Pope had resolved not to come to a decisive Battle, unless he were in a manner assured of the Victory, knowing how dangerous it was to engage with valiant Soldiers, and who, because the Reward of Success was unequal, were ready to hazard themselves; that the Damage would be very considerable if his Army should be overcome, because the State of the Church and of the Florentines would be exposed to manifest Danger; and that it was the safest Way to tempo-rise, and stand upon the Defensive, since he had good Grounds to hope that the Want of Money and Provisions, in so poor and barren a Country, would be sufficient to put the Enemy in Disorder, and no less Reason to believe that his own Army by Experience, and by the Reinforcements which it received Month after Month of choicer Troops, would be in a better Condition; and also because he was in Expectation that the State of his Affairs would improve every Day, considering

A. D. that in the Beginning of this Movement, ^{1517.} besides taking care to assist himself with the pontifical Authority, he had earnestly demanded Succours of all the Princes, making his Complaints to their Ambassadors in Rome, and by Apostolic Briefs, and by Messages, to the Princes themselves; but not to all of them after the same Manner. For in signifying to Cæsar and the King of Spain the Conspiracy formed by Francesco Maria della Rovere and the Spanish Foot in the Camp of the King of France, and under the Eyes of his Lieutenant, he inserted such Expressions in the Briefs, as made it plainly appear that he had no small Suspicion that the Plot was concerted with the Knowledge of that King; but with the most Christian King, after shewing some Suspicions of Lautrech, he did not push his Complaints any farther.

complains of the Duke of Urbino.

THE Affair of Urbino was regarded by the Princes with different Concern, for Cæsar and his Grandson understood with great Pleasure that the Pope imputed this Injury to the King of France. The first from his antient Hatred, and natural Inconstancy, constancy, being already at Variance with the King of France, had entered into a new Confederacy with the King of England, and in a Conference with his Grandson at Antwerp dissuaded him from his intended Interview with the King of France, which was at last wholly laid aside by Consent of both Kings; and as for the Catholic King, his Confederacy with the King of France was not sufficient to suppress his rising Emulation and Jealousy of him. They readily therefore offered the Pope their Assistance, and commanded all their Subjects to desist from serving in a War against the Pope; and the Catholic King ordered the Count of Potenza, in the Kingdom of Naples, to review his Men at Arms, and to march with Four Hundred Lances to his Assistance; and, for the greater Testimony of his Affection, he deprived, as in Case of Disobedience, Francesco Maria of the Dutchy of Sora, which was purchased by his Father on the Borders of the Terra di Lavoro.

BUT the King of France was for a different Reason pleased with the Troubles of the disaffected towards him ; and therefore at first, following his Example, and feeding him with vain Hopes, he answered that he was extremely concerned at his Misfortunes, and promised to take care that Lautrech should assist him in his Proceedings, subjoining, however, that the Pontiff himself had been the Cause of his own Sufferings, for the Spaniards would never have been so audacious if their Numbers had not been increased by those who, with his Leave, had passed from Naples to Verona. Such were the King's Intentions at the Beginning, but afterwards considering that if the Pontiff were abandoned by him, he might precipitate himself without Restraint into an Alliance with the Catholic King, he resolved to shew him some Favour, but at the same time to make some Profit of his Necessity. The Pontiff therefore soliciting his Assistance, he ordered that Three Hundred Lances should march from Milan for that Purpose, and at the same time proposed as needful a new Confederacy between them, because that which had been contracted at Bologna had been been violated by the Pope many Ways, ^{A. D.} and was therefore become of no longer ^{1517.} Consideration. These Offers were attended with many Complaints, for sometimes the King complained that the Pope had wrongfully accused him to other Princes, sometimes that out of Spite to him, and to gratify the Cardinal of Sion, he had excommunicated Giorgio Soprasasso who favoured his Interest with the Swiss. Besides this, the King's Mother, who had the Title of Regent, and had great Authority with him, reproved, without Respect, the unmerciful Dealings of the Pope, who not content with driving a Prince out of his own State, had afterwards excommunicated him, and by withholding the Dowry and the Profits of it from the Dutchess Dowager, and from the young Dutchess his Wife, had been the Cause of their wanting Necessaries for Subsistence; and her Words coming to the Ears of the Pope augmented his Suspicions.

BUT the Pope beset with so many Difficulties desired the French Auxiliaries, not for their Service, but for their Name and

A. D. Reputation, and the Three Hundred 1517. Lances took their March from Milan, but were directed by the Pope, who was not able to dissemble his Suspicions, to halt for many Days in the Modenese and Bolognese, after which they were by Lorenzo assigned Quarters in Rimini, because that City being at a good Distance from the Enemy, they had the less Power while they were stationed there to do any Mischief. Nor were those Suspicions moderated by the Confederacy which about the same Time was concluded at Rome, for the King before he would ratify started new Difficulties, by which the Affair was suspended for many Days; but at last, the Pope giving up many Points, the King ratified.
 The Confederacy contained a reciprocal Obligation between the Pontiff and the King to the Defence of their respective States, with a certain Number of Troops, and Twelve Thousand Ducats a Month: That between the King of France and the Florentines, in Conjunction with the Authority of Lorenzo de' Medici, and with the Comprehension of the Dutchy of Urbino, there should be the same Obligation, but with

with a less Number of Troops, and Six ^{A. D.} Thousand Ducats a Month: That the ^{1517.} King should be bound to assist the Pope when he had a Mind to proceed against the Subjects or Feudataries of the Church: That the Pope should grant the King the Nomination of Benefices, and the Tenths according to the Promises he had made in Bologna, on Condition that the Money should be repositied in order to be expended in a War against the Turks, under which specious Pretence the Tenths were granted, but with tacit Hopes given the King, that after the whole Quantity was deposited, the Condition with which it was clogged should be taken off by another Brief, and the King left at Liberty to convert it wholly to his own Use. The Pope promised the King by a separate Brief never to request his Aid against the Duke of Ferrara, and even be content that the King should take him into his Protection. There was a long Dispute about the Restitution of Reggio, Modena and Rubiera, which was demanded by his Majesty with the greatest Earnestness according to the Promises he had received

A. D. at Bologna. Nor was it denied by the ^{1517.} Pope, but reserved for another Time, for which he alledged as Reasons, that it would be highly unworthy of him, and look like a Confession that he was driven to the last Necessity, to restore those Towns when he was encumbered with War. The King, however, insisted on a present Restitution, till at last the Pope appearing disposed to break off from all Engagements, if the Point were pressed any farther, his Most Christian Majesty considering that the King of England was his Enemy, and that he suspected Cæsar, the King of Spain, and the Swiss, was content with a Brief to be put into his Hands, in which the Pope should promise to restore Modena, Reggio and Rubiera to the Duke of Ferrara within the next seven Months.
But Leo had resolved in his Mind, as soon as he should be freed from his Dangers, to pay no more Regard to his Brief than he had to his Word which he had passed at Bologna. And as for the King, since he could obtain no more of the Pontiff without Danger of incurring his extreme Indignation, he thought it, however, of some Moment

would appear in Writing. 1517.

BUT while these Things were in Agitation the Army of Lorenzo being sufficiently augmented, for, besides many new Levies of Italians, the Pope had lifted a Thousand Spanish and as many German Foot in Rome, it appeared high Time to attempt getting free from this War, for which Purpose it was necessary to dislodge the Enemy from their strong Camp, which they could only hope to effect by forcing them to abandon it for Want of Provisions. Camillo Orsino was therefore detached with Seven Hundred light Horse to scour the Country called the Vicariato, from which the Enemy drew the greater Part of their Subsistence. At this Time a Trumpet came to Pesaro from the Enemy's Army, to demand of Lorenzo a Pass for one Suares a Spanish Officer, and any one whom he should bring in his Company, to wait upon him. Lorenzo easily granted his Request, imagining this Suares had been an Officer with whom he held secret Intelligence. But there came another Officer

A. D. of the same Name, and with him Oratio 1517. da Fermo, Secretary to Francesco Maria.

 challenges Lorenzo.

After demanding public Audience Suares, in the Name of Francesco Maria, declared, that as the Differences between them were capable of being decided by a Combat of them alone, or in Conjunction with a determinate Number on each Side, it was more convenient to chuse one of these Methods, than persevere in that Course by which the People were wickedly destroyed, and their future Lord, whoever he should be, greatly endamaged. Francesco Maria, therefore, gives Leave to Lorenzo to chuse either of these Methods as he thinks fit. After these Words he offered to read a Writing, but was forbidden. Lorenzo, by the Advice of his Officers, answered that he willingly accepted the Proposal, provided that Francesco Maria would first relinquish what he had taken Possession of by Violence. When he had thus spoken, at the Instigation of Renzo da Ceri, he ordered them both to be imprisoned, Renzo affirming that they deserved to be punished for their extraordinary Insolence. But the rest of the Generals reproving him for Breach

 ous Violation of his Faith by false Cavils, as if it had been necessary for Oratio, who was by Origin a Subject of the Church, and by Employment a Secretary of an Enemy, to be expressly named in the Pass. But this was done with an Intent to extort from him the secret Counsels of Francesco Maria, and particularly to learn by whose Advice and Authority he had raised the War. Being examined on the Rack, it is reported he made such a Confession as augmented the Jealousy conceived of the King of France.

BUT the Design of Lorenzo to prevent the Spaniards from receiving Supplies of Provisions from the Vicariato required greater Forces to put it effectually in Execution, for the Excursions of the light Horse were very insufficient for that End, and the Army was now in a Condition boldly to face the Enemy. For Lorenzo had got together, besides a Thousand Men at Arms, and as many light Horse, Fifteen Thousand Foot of different Nations, among whom

A. D. 1517. whom were above Two Thousand Spaniards enlisted at Rome, an Infantry perfectly exercised in Arms, and very choice Troops; and the Italian Foot, there being no War in any other Place, and the Officers on that Account having Opportunities to exchange by Degrees the more unserviceable new and hasty Levies for Troops of longer Standing and of more Service, consisted of the Flower of the Infantry in all Italy. It was resolved then to march and encamp at Sorbolungo, a Castle of the Territory of Fano, five Miles distant from Fossombrone, in which Situation it was easy to prevent the Enemy from receiving Provisions out of the Vicariato. The City of Fossombrone is seated on the River Metro, famous for the Victory of the Romans over Asdrubal the Carthaginian. This River has its Course as far as that Place in a Channel straitened between the Mountains, but as soon as it has passed Fossombrone begins to glide through a wider Valley, which still dilates itself the nearer it approaches the Sea, which is fifteen Miles distant from Fossombrone, and the Metro falls into it near Fano, but on the Side towards Sinigaglia.
On

On the right Hand, according to the Courſe ^{A. D.} of the River, is the Country called the Vica- ^{1517.} riato, all full of fertile Hills and Villages, and extending itſelf a long Way toward the Sea Coaſts. On the left Hand of the River are alſo Hills, but at a greater Diſtance you meet with lofty and rugged Mountains; and that Part of the Plain which extends itſelf towards Fano is above three Miles in Breadth. When Lorenzo therefore determined to go, and poſt himſelf at Sorbolungo, ſuſpecting that the Enemy, on perceiving the Motion of his Camp, would prevent him, he detached, before Break of Day, Giovanni de' Medici, Giovan Battista da Stabbia, and Brunoro da Forli with Four Hundred light Horſe to take Poſſeſſion of the Caſtle, and having ordered the Foot that were at Candelara and Nugolara to croſs the Mountains, and march to join the others towards the Metro, he himſelf with the whole Remainder of the Army, leaving Guido Rangone with an Hundred and Fifty Men at Arms for the Security of Pefaro, decamped at Sunriſe, and took his March from Pefaro towards Fano along the Sea Shore; and turning towards towards Fossombrone, where the Valley begins, he arrived by Noon at a Place called il Mulino di Madonna on the River, which all the Horse, and the Italian Infantry waded, but the Gascons and Germans were so slow in passing it over a Bridge prepared for that Purpose, that the Army not being able to arrive the same Day, according to Appointment, at Sorbolungo, were constrained to take up their Quarters at San Giorgio, Occiano and Mondavio, Villages half a Mile distant one from another. But the light Horse had no better Success in executing their Orders than the others, for, while they were on their March, Giovanni de' Medici, who in this his first Campaign gave Signs of his future Valour and Conduct, perceiving that by Mistake they had taken the longest Way, left the others, who despised his Advice, and entered Sorbolungo several Hours before Night; the other Officers, after fetching a long Compass, being deceived, as they said, by their Guide, returned at last to the Army. Nor could Giovanni de' Medici, who had only his own Regiment with him, take up his Quarters that Night in Sorbolungo;

for

for the same Morning Francesco Maria perceiving the Enemy in Motion, and imagining whither they were going, had with utmost Expedition put himself on his March with the whole Army, in which he met with no Impediment from the River, passing it at Fossombrone over a Stone Bridge, and arrived at Sorbolungo before Night. On his Coming Giovanni finding himself unable to make Resistance retired towards Orciano, being followed by the Enemy's Horse, who took many of his Men Prisoners. When he was got into Orciano he repaired to the Quarters of Lorenzo, and told him, with the greatest Indignation, that either by the Negligence or Cowardice of Brunoro and Giovan Battista da Stabbia, who were there present, he had that Day lost the Opportunity of giving a happy Turn to the War. This was the first but not the only Piece of ill Conduct in the Army of Lorenzo by Mis-improvement of Advantages, for afterwards they lost greater Opportunities of Success, and more pernicious Disorders continually followed, bad Counsels attending upon adverse Fortune. The Castles of Orciano

A. D. and Sorbolungo are seated on Eminences, 1517. and distant one from another a little above two Miles ; the Ground between them is full of little Hills and Mountains, and has a Castle called Barti, which was possessed by Part of the Troops of Francesco Maria, and in so near a Vicinity of the Armies the next Day was spent in Skirmishes.

VARIOUS were the Opinions of the Generals in Lorenzo's Army ; some of them, but chiefly those who had not Authority enough to sway the Resolution, were for marching up and attacking the Enemy, with a Design, perhaps, by vainly proposing bold Counsels, without Hazard to themselves or others, to acquire the Name of Courageous. But Renzo and Vitello, whose Advice was always followed by Lorenzo, dissuaded him from that Opinion, because the Enemies were strongly posted under the Shelter of a Castle, to which was no Access but by a difficult Road. They were also against remaining in their present Situation, as of no Service, and not answering the End for which they had moved from Pesaro ; for while Sorbo- lungo

lungo was in the Possession of Francesco Maria it was very difficult to prevent him from supplying himself with Provisions from the Vicariato. These Reasons being sufficient to condemn all other Resolutions, it was of Necessity concluded that the Army should return the same Way; and that this Retreat might not have the Appearance of a Flight, it was proposed that they should not retire to their former Quarters, but go and take Possession of Monte Baroccio and other Posts which the Enemy had quitted, from which they might proceed towards Urbino. With this Resolution the Army decamped the next Morning by Break of Day; but this Motion was believed not to be a Retreat but a Flight, and this Opinion being spread through their whole Camp, two Men at Arms fled away to Francesco Maria, and informed him that his Enemies were seized with a Consternation, and had broke up in manner of a Flight. The Duke therefore imagining himself almost sure of Victory immediately moved with his Army by the Road that crosses the Mountains, in Hopes of preventing the Enemy, and falling upon them as soon

A. D.

A. D. soon as they were descended into the Plain, 1517. as he supposed they would be sure to take the shortest and easiest Way, which if they had taken it would have been impossible for either Party to avoid coming to a Battle. But Fortune had ordered that, for the Sake of saving a Piece of Cannon left behind the Day before on the Breaking of one of its Carriage-Wheels, the Army of Lorenzo should march and repass the Metro at the same Molino di Madonna, which is a Place four Miles lower than the Passage to which they would have gone by the shortest and easiest Road. On such slight Causes and Accidents are often dependent in Wars Events of the greatest Importance! All the Horse and Foot waded the River, but very slowly, and those that had passed were immediately drawn up in Order towards Fossombrone.
 The Foot had already passed, and the Men at Arms and light Horse, which were numerous and choice, began to skirmish with them. In the Conflict was taken Gostantino, the Son, and you may as well say the Grandson, of Gian Pagolo Baglione, for he begot him on his own Sister.
 Wherefore

Wherefore Gian Pagolo, who arrived in the Army not many Days before, and conducted the Vanguard, while he was busied in making his utmost Efforts to recover him, spent so much Time that from the Vanguard he became the Rearguard, Lorenzo, who led the main Battle, succeeded him in the Van, and Troilo Savello, who conducted the Rearguard, became with his Troops the main Battle, for Renzo and Vitello with the Foot marched forwards. But as soon as Francesco Maria and his Commanders perceived that the Enemy according as they had passed the River turned themselves towards Fossombrone, they were convinced that they had put themselves in Motion not in order for a Flight, but to possess themselves of Monte Baroccio. They had no longer therefore a Desire to fight, which was grounded on an imaginary Terror of the Enemy, but left their Baggage, and immediately ran with all the Speed they could make, in no manner of Order, and with their Colours on their Shoulders, to seize upon a strong Pass on the River, called Tavernelle, where Nature has form'd a Ditch between Precipices, which runs quite acroſs the Plain to the Mountains, and cannot be paſſed but at one Place, which is levelled for the Road. If the Troops of Lorenzo, as they had paſſed the River, had directed their March that Way, and arrived firſt at that Paſs, the Spaniards would have been in very dangerous Circumſtances. But though Lodovico, Son of Liverotto da Fermo, who was the ſame Day arrived in the Army with a Thouſand Foot, and a Spaniſh Serjeant, who were both acquainted with the Country, gave Notice to Lorenzo and his Generals of the favourable Opportunity, they made no Advantage of it; for though the German and Gaſcon Infantry ſhewed a mighty Eagerneſs to engage, and the ſame Shouting for a Battle ran through all the Camp, to which Lorenzo ſeemed no way averſe, yet it was the Advice of Renzo da Ceri and Vitello by no means to encounter with the Enemy, but to retire to a neighbouring Hill, whence, without expoſing themſelves to any Danger, they might with their light Horſe do them very conſiderable Damage in their Paſſing of the River.

Thus

Thus leaving that strong Pass open Renzo A. D. 1517. turned his March towards the Mountain, and the Spaniards had no sooner seized the Pass than they saluted the Germans that were near them with their Harquebuses, and full of Alacrity shouted for Joy that they knew themselves delivered from manifest Danger into a State of almost perfect Security.

THUS either thro' Imprudence or Cowardice, if Malignity had no Share in it, Lorenzo, in the Opinion of all Men, lost that Day an Opportunity of Victory. The next Night his Army took up their Quarters at a neighbouring Castle called Saltara, but the Army of Francesco Maria continued to march with the greatest Speed for a good Part of the Night, till they arrived at their old Quarters at Monte Baroccio, preventing Two Thousand Foot detached by Lorenzo to seize that Post. That General the next Day removed his Camp two Miles above Saltara towards Situation of the Armies. the Mountain to a Place that looks towards Monte Baroccio, but lower, and on the Side towards the Sea. The Armies rested in this Situation at the Distance of about a Mile one from another, but with greater Inconvenience to that of Lorenzo, which often suffered for Want of Provisions; for as they were conveyed from Pesaro to Fano by Sea, it was necessary, whenever the Navigation was obstructed by contrary Winds, to escort them by Land, in which they met with many Impediments from the light Horse of Francesco Maria, who, receiving constant Intelligence from the Peasants of every Motion, how inconsiderable soever, of the Enemy, were continually scouring over all the Country.

AT this Time Francesco Maria sent a Trumpet to shew the Gascons certain Letters which were found among the Papers of Lorenzo's Secretaries, which together with Part of his Carriages had been taken by the Enemy's Horse on the Day that he removed from the Castle of Saltara. By these Letters it appeared that the Pope being tired with the unconscionable Exactions of the Gascons, whose Pay it had been necessary to increase every Month to a most immoderate Degree, desired the General to use all his Endeavours to induce them to return beyond the Mountains. On this Occasion there had like to have been a Tumult among the Gascons that same Day, if Carbon their General, who was a Gascon, and Lorenzo de' Medici had not done all they could to persuade them that these Letters were counterfeit, and a meer Trick of the Enemy, and by that Means restrained them. The Suspicion, however, of such a Disorder, together with the Difficulty of receiving Provisions, and the Inconvenience of their Situation, where the Danger of sustaining some Loss was without Comparifon greater than the Hopes of obtaining any Advantage, made them resolve on Decamping, though it seemed somewhat disgraceful to draw off so frequently from the Enemy, and to enter the Vicariato on that Side which is nearest to the Sea, and to proceed as far as the Borders towards Fossombrone. This Resolution met with the Approbation of the whole Camp, but reflected great Shame and Dishonour on Renzo and Vitello; for all the Soldiers cried out with one united Voice that if they had taken the same Resolution

A. D. 1517. at the Beginning they would have reduced the Enemies to great Straits by cutting off their Provisions; nay Lorenzo himself more than others blamed them, complaining that either with a View to prolong the War for their own Profit, or to prevent him from making himself renowned in Arms, dreading perhaps the same Effects from his Greatness as their Family had suffered from the Greatness of Duke Valentino, they had brought into such a Multitude of Difficulties and Dangers an Army so potent, and so superior in Number and Strength to the Enemy.

LORENZO then with his Army marched and laid Siege to San Gostanzo, a Castle of the Vicariato, and tho' the Inhabitants, while the Cannon were playing on the Walls, begged Leave to capitulate, yet the General knowing it was easy to force the Place, and desiring to mitigate the proud Spirits of the Gascons, drew off the other Soldiers from the Wall, and left none but the Gascons to give the Assault, that they might have all the Plunder to themselves. After taking Gostanzo the Army went the same Day and laid Siege to Mondolfo, two Miles

Miles distant, the strongest and best Castle ^{A. D.} of the Vicariato, seated on a Hill upon an ^{1517.} Eminence, and surrounded by Ditches, and a Wall by no means contemptible, to which the Situation of the Place makes a Rampart, and garrisoned by two Hundred Spanish Foot. The Cannon were planted the same Night on the Side towards the South, but either through the Negligence or Inconsiderateness of Renzo da Ceri, who had the Direction, they were planted in an open Place, and without Ramparts, so that, before the Sun had been risen an Hour, eight Gunners, and a Multitude of Workmen were killed, and Antonio SantaCroce, General of the Artillery, was wounded by the Cannon of the Place. Lorenzo was greatly disturbed at this Loss, and tho' he was advised by all the Generals not to execute himself at so great a Hazard what might be committed to the Management of others, he went in Person to order and inspect the Construction of the Ramparts, where having fatigued himself till Noon, and cast up such Works as were necessary, he retired to go and take his Repose under

D. 1517. Lorenzo wounded. some Trees, where he thought he should be covered by the Rising of the Mountain; but as he was going the Height of the Hill failing to cover him, he perceived on one Side a Fort situated towards the West, and had no sooner discovered it than he saw the Flash of a Harquebuss; to avoid the Shot he threw himself with his Face towards the Earth, but before his Body reached the Ground the Bullet, which would otherwise have penetrated his Body, struck him on the Top of the Head, and grazing on the Bone, passed along the Scalp, and came out towards the Nape of the Neck.

AFTER Lorenzo was wounded, the Generals perceiving that tho' the Wall was in a ruinous Condition the Rampart was yet too high, began to work on a Mine, which they carried under a Tower contiguous to the Breach, and springing it on the fifth Day it blew up the Tower with a great Piece of the adjoining Wall, on which an Assault was immediately given, but in a disorderly, and, as it were, careless Manner, which produced no other Effect

Effect than what continually results from ^{A. D.} an ill disposed Attack. But when Night ^{1517.} came on the Garrison expecting no Relief, because Francesco Maria, either because he would not lose his advantageous Situation, or for some other Reason, had not decamped from Monte Baroccio, ^{Mondolfo} surrendered on Condition of Safety to their ^{surrendered to} Persons and Effects, basely leaving the ^{Lorenzo's} Inhabitants a Prey to the Soldiers. ^{Army.}

LORENZO from his Wound being in very great Danger of his Life, the Pope sent as Legate to the Army the Cardinal of Santa Maria in Portico, who, as bad Fortune had already joined itself to the worst of Governments, entered on his Legation with unlucky Omens; for the Day after his Arrival in the Army a Quarrel happening to arise between an Italian and a German Foot-Soldier, and those that were nearest running into the Fray, and every one crying up the Name of his Nation, the Tumult spread itself over the whole Camp, so that none knowing whence or for what Reason it arose, all the Foot retired tumultuously to the Quarters

But those 'who in retiring happened to light upon Troops of another Tongue, had many of them their Throats cut; and, what was the Cause of the greater Disorder, the Italian Foot, which went in good Order towards the Place where the Quarrel began, had their Quarters in the mean time plundered by the Gascons. The chief Officers of the Army assembled together with a Design to put a Stop to these Disorders, but seeing the Tumult grown to a great Height and dangerous, every one abandoned the Care of the Public for his private Interests, and each Officer retiring to his Quarters immediately put his Men at Arms in Order, and thinking only how to bring them off in Safety, led them about a Mile out of the Camp. Only the Legate Bibbiena, with a Constancy and Readiness becoming his Honour and Office, did not abandon the common Cause, tho' oftentimes put in great Danger of his Life by the Fury of the enraged Multitude. By his pious Endeavours, though not without great Difficulty, and the Interposition of many Officers of the Foot, the Tumult

Tumult was at length appeased, after A. D. there had perished in several Quarters of ¹⁵¹⁷ the Camp above an Hundred German Foot, above Twenty Italian, and some Spanish Foot. This Accident was the Cause that (as it was doubted that if the Army stay'd together the Foot, being exasperated by the Injuries they had received, would on any slight Occasion fall together by the Ears) a Resolution was taken to go upon no Enterprize for the present, but to keep the Army separate. Wherefore the Men at Arms belonging to the Church and the Florentines, with the Italian Foot, had their Quarters assigned in the City of Pesaro; for as to the French Lances, the Differences between the Pontiff and King being not yet adjusted, they had never moved from Rimini. The Gascon Foot encamped in a Plain about half a Mile from that City, and the rest of the Infantry were distributed upon the Mountain della Imperiale, on which is a Palace built by the antient Malatesti; and they were disposed in such Order that the Spaniards had their Quarters on the Top of the Mountain, the Germans lower on the Descent, and the Corficans this Situation they remained three and twenty Days, during which there happened no Action but Skirmiſhes between the light Horſe. For Francesco Maria, having no Grounds to hope for a Victory over ſo numerous an Enemy in the open Field, and as little Reason to expect Succeſs in the Siege of any Town while they lay ſo near him, was only intent to preſerve what he had acquired.

BUT on the four and twentieth Day the Duke decamped in the Night from Monte Baroccio, and arrived by Break of Day on the Top of the Mountain at the Quarters of the Spaniards, with all or ſome of whom, it is believed from what appeared in the Progreſs of the Affair, he had held ſecret Intelligence. Immediately upon his Arrival the Spaniards of his own Party cried out to the others, that, if they intended to ſave themſelves, they ſhould follow them; at which Call the greater Part of Lorenzo's Spaniards, each Man putting on his Head a Twig with green Leaves, as the others had, went over to them, only ^{A. D.} the Officers, with about Eight Hundred ^{1517.} Foot, retired to Pesaro. Thus joined they ^{Duke of Urbino} went and beat up the Quarters of the Ger- ^{beats up} mans, who had no Watch on that Side, ^{the Enemy's} as imagining themselves in Security from ^{Quarters.} the Neighbourhood of the Spaniards; finding them thus unguarded, they killed and wounded above Six Hundred of them, the rest flying down to the Corficans, with whom they joined, and marched all off together towards Pesaro. The Gascons perceived the Tumult, and got under Arms, but would not so much as stir out of their Places.

FRANCESCO MARIA, having done this Execution upon the Germans, and drawn over the greater Part of the Spaniards into his Service, encamped with his Army between Urbino and Pesaro, full of Hopes that he should be joined by the Gascons, and by those German Foot who had at the same Time been broken and quitted the Camp of Lautrech, and had ever since marched, lodged, and proceeded in Conjunction with them. Among the Gascons

A. D. 1517. was one Ambra, who was emulous of the General Carbone, being a young Gentleman of more noble Blood, a Kinsman of Lautrech, and of greater Authority with them. This Ambra had for many Days been secretly contriving to carry over these Gascon Foot with him to Francesco Maria. And he had an Opportunity given him by their Discontent, for they were not satisfied with an immoderate Increase of their Pay, but made fresh and insolent Demands, and stood upon much higher Terms, with which the Pope's Ministry refusing to comply, Carbone, and the General of the French Lances, who came from Rimini to Pesaro on that Account, interposed for bringing them to an Agreement. But five or six Days after what had happened to the Spaniards and Germans at the Mountain della Imperiale, Francesco Maria with his whole Army appeared in their Neighbourhood, on which Part of the Gascons together with Ambra drew up in Order of Battle with six Field Pieces, and, followed by the Germans, went over to him, Carbone in vain endeavouring by Intreaties and the warmest Expostulations to retain them, so that there remained with him only Seven Officers, and Thirteen Hundred Foot, for all the rest with the Germans abandoned him; and as in military Affairs Disorders always beget Disorders, the Italian Foot seeing the Necessity there was of them, the next Morning made a Mutiny, and it was necessary to grant their extravagant Demands in their Payments to appease them, as little Shame and as much Avarice being found in the Officers as in the Soldiers. And it was really Matter of Admiration that in the Army of Francesco Maria, in which the Soldiers received no Money, there should be so much Concord, Obedience and Unanimity, which proceeded not so much from the Abilities and Authority of the General, as it was said in high Commendation of Annibal the Carthaginian, as from the Ardor and Obstinacy of the Soldiers; and, on the contrary, that in the Army of the Church, where excessive Payments were never wanting at due Times, there should be so much Confusion and Disorder, and so great a Desire in the Troops to desert to the Enemy; whence

A. D. 1517. it appears that it is not so much by Money as by some other Causes that Concord and Obedience are oftentimes preserved in Armies.

THE Legate and others who assisted in Council being terrified at so many Misfortunes, after long Debates on procuring some Remedy for the present distressed Circumstances, being neither more prudent, nor better supplied with proper Means for making Provisions after Disorders had happened, than they had been to provide that they should not happen at all, incited also by private Passions and Interests, concluded that the Pope should be advised to restore the Bentivogli to Bologna, before that Family, taking Encouragement from the declining State of his Affairs, or at the Instigation of others, should make some Movement; and how difficult it would be for him in that Case to make Resistance appeared by the hard Struggles he had to sustain the War only in one Place. Wherefore, after they had, to give the more Authority to such Advice, or for the better Justification of every one in all Events, got the Opinion of all the Members drawn ^{A. D.} up in Writing, and subscribed by the Le- ^{1517.} gate, and Archbishop Orsino, one attached by antient Friendship, and the other by Kindred, to the Bentivogli, and by all the General Officers, they sent the Paper by Ruberto Boschetto, a Modenese Nobleman, to the Pope. But his Holiness not only ^{Pope re-} rejected the same with Disdain, but be- ^{jects Ad-} moaned himself with very bitter Com- ^{vice to re-} plaints that his Ministers, and those who ^{store the} had received so many Favours of him, or ^{Benti-} might at all Opportunities expect Marks ^{vogli.} of his Benevolence, should so far forget their Duty, and have so little Love for him, as to propose such Counsels as were no less pernicious than the Mischiefs which his Enemies did him; but he expressed his Resentments principally against the Archbishop Orsino, because he had perhaps been the chief Agent in stimulating the rest to this Counsel; and this Indignation of the Pontiff is supposed to have been the Cause that the Archbishop was disappointed of the Dignity of the Cardinalship, to which he was destined, by universal Expectation, at the first Promotion.

BUT Francesco Maria, from so considerable an Increase of his Forces, and Diminution of those of his Adversaries, raised his Thoughts to greater Undertakings, to which he was urged also by Necessity, for the Troops which he had brought with him had been near three Months without Pay, and it was out of his Power to find any Money for those who lately came over to him ; and his Dutchy being exhausted, and in a manner all spoiled, the Soldiers were not only deprived of all Means of maintaining themselves on the Prey and Plunder of those Territories, but could not without Difficulty be supplied with Provisions from thence sufficient to keep them from starving. But in the Choice of the Enterprize he was obliged to follow the Will of others; for as to himself he was desirous, for the Establishment of his State, before he made any other Attempt, to make a fresh Attack upon Fano, or some other of the Towns, on the Sea Coast, but on account of the Inclination of the Soldiers, who were greedy of Prey and Rapine, he resolved solved rather to turn his Arms against Tuscany, where, because it was a plentiful Country, that suspected no Invasion, and was but slenderly provided for Resistance, it was expected to meet with vast Booty. Besides this, he was in Hopes that, by Means of Carlo Baglione and Borghese Petrucci, he might be enabled to effect a Revolution in Perugia and Siena, which would be of no small Advantage to his Affairs, as well as troublesome and dangerous to those of the Pontiff and his Nephew. The next Day, therefore, after he had been joined by the Gascons, he moved with his Army towards Perugia, but as soon as he was arrived in the Plains of Agobbio he resolved to discover his Suspicion, or rather almost certain Knowledge of the Treachery of Colonel Maldonato and of others concerned with him in the same Cause. The Plot was formed, and brought to Light in the following Manner: When the Army passed through Romagna, Suares, a Spanish Officer, remained behind under Pretence of Sicknefs, and suffering himself on purpose to be taken Prisoner, was brought to Lorenzo at Cesena, where he

A. D. 1517. told him, on the Part of Maldonato and two other Spanish Officers, that the Cause of their joining with Francesco Maria had been no other than a Design by that Means to take an Occasion to do some signal Piece of Service to the Pontiff and to him, since it had not been in their Power to prevent that Movement from taking Place, promising him in their Name that as soon as they had an Opportunity they would put it in Execution. Francesco Maria, who was ignorant of the Conspiracy, began to be suspicious from some Words unadvisedly spoken by Renzo da Ceri to a Drummer of the Spaniards, when he demanded of him in Raillery, “When will those Spaniards give us up your Duke for a Prisoner?” These Words made a deep Impression on Francesco Maria, and had given him Occasion to watch very diligently whether there were any treasonable Practices in his Army, till at last he was satisfied, from some Papers that were intercepted with Lorenzo’s Carriages, that Maldonato was the Author of some perfidious Design,

THE Duke had hitherto kept the whole Affair secret, but now thought it not convenient to dissemble any longer; and therefore calling an Assembly of all the Spanish Foot, and standing on a raised Place in the Midst of them, he began with thanking them in most affectionate Expressions for the Services which they had with so much Readiness performed for his Sake, confessing that neither modern Times, nor antient Histories could afford an Instance of any Prince or General who stood under such great Obligations to Troops of War, as he knew himself indebted in to them, considering that though he had no Money, nor Means to assure them of any Reward, since if he had recovered his whole State, he would still be but a petty Sovereign, had never done them any Kindness, was not of the same Nation, nor had ever served with them in the Field, they had yet been so readily disposed to follow him against a Prince of such Grandeur and Reputation, not allured by any Hopes of Prey, for they knew they were to be conducted into a poor poor and barren Country: That for these Services he had no Way to testify his Acknowledgements but by sincere and hearty Professions of Good-will and Affection, but that he was highly pleased and rejoiced that they had acquired such wonderful Renown not only through all Italy, but through every Region of Europe, every one extolling to the Skies their uncommon Fidelity and Valour, that being very few in Number, without Money, without Artillery, without any of the necessary Provisions of War, they had so often made an Army turn their Backs, which was most abundantly supplied with Money and all other Things, and was composed of so many warlike Nations, and had manfully resisted the Power of a very great Pontiff and of the State of the Florentines, in Conjunction with the Name and Authority of the Kings of France and Spain, despising the Orders of their own Sovereigns that they might maintain the Faith and the Fame of military Men: That as these Considerations gave him inconceivable Pleasure for the Glory of their Name, so on the contrary whatever had a Tendency dency to obscure so great a Lustre, affected him with incredible Grief: that it was with sore Unwillingness and inestimable Sorrow of Mind that he was induced to lay open some Matters which would constrain him to offend some of them, to each of whom he had before resolved to dedicate his humble Service in particular during his Life: But, however, that the Disorder which was begun might not increase through his Silence, and that the Malignity of some Few might not cast a Blemish on so great a Glory acquired by that Army, and it being also more fit and reasonable that he should suffer himself to be influenced by his Regard to the Honour of them all rather than by his Deference to a Few, he was obliged to acquaint them that there were in that Army four Persons that were plotting to betray the Glory and Safety of the whole Army; of his own he made no Mention nor Complaint, because he had met with so many Disasters, and been so bitterly persecuted by Fortune without his Fault, that he sometimes wished to die rather than live; but his Obligations to them, and his unbounded Love,

A. D. 1517. The Legate also had ordered to his Assistance Camillo Orfino his Son-in-law, an Officer of the Florentines, with the Men at Arms under his Command, and Two Hundred and Fifty light Horse. These Forces, it was believed, were sufficient to sustain the Attacks of the Enemy, especially since many Preparations had been also made to obstruct their Progress, for Vittello with his Regiment of Men at Arms was marched to Citta di Castello, as was also Sise with the French Lances, which since the Establishment of the Confederacy between the Pontiff and the King were no longer suspected; and Lorenzo de' Medici, who being cured of his Wound was lately come from Ancona to Pesaro, was gone Post to Florence to make the necessary Provisions for the Preservation of that State, and of the neighbouring Cities; and it was resolved that the Legate with the rest of the Army, in order to oblige Francesco Maria to abandon his Enterprize on Tuscany, should enter the Dutchy of Urbino, which had no other Defence than the Inhabitants of the Towns.

FRANCESCO MARIA approached Perugia not without Hopes of some Intelligence, and indeed it happened that Gian Pagolo riding through the City was attacked in the Middle of the Street by an Inhabitant of the Place, who missing his Blow was immediately cut to Pieces by the Concurrence of Pagolo's Attendants, and in the Tumult he caused some others of those whom he suspected to be killed. Thus having escaped from Snares he seemed to be free from all Danger, for the Enemy, who had now lain several Days before Perugia, were not strong enough to make an Attempt upon it; and yet, when the Pontiff least expected it, he entered into an Agreement with the hostile Army, alleging, in his Justification, that the People of Perugia, whom it was not in his Power to resist, would no longer suffer the Damages which were done their Country. By this Agreement Gian Pagolo was to pay that Army Ten Thousand Ducats, to grant them Provisions for four Days, and not to bear Arms against Francesco Maria during that War, and the Enemy was immediately

The Legate also had ordered to his Assistance Camillo Orsino his Son-in-law, an Officer of the Florentines, with the Men at Arms under his Command, and Two Hundred and Fifty light Horse. These Forces, it was believed, were sufficient to sustain the Attacks of the Enemy, especially since many Preparations had been also made to obstruct their Progress, for Vittello with his Regiment of Men at Arms was marched to Citta di Castello, as was also Sise with the French Lances, which since the Establishment of the Confederacy between the Pontiff and the King were no longer suspected; and Lorenzo de' Medici, who being cured of his Wound was lately come from Ancona to Pesaro, was gone Post to Florence to make the necessary Provisions for the Preservation of that State, and of the neighbouring Cities; and it was resolved that the Legate with the rest of the Army, in order to oblige Francesco Maria to abandon his Enterprize on Tuscany, should enter the Dutchy of Urbino, which had no other Defence than the Inhabitants of the Towns.

The Pope was much concerned at this Transaction, and took it very ill, for it confirmed him in the Opinion he had conceived of Gian Pagolo from the very Beginning of the War, when he marched so very slowly with the promised Auxiliaries to the Army, that, out of a Jealousy of the Power of Lorenzo, he was desirous that Francesco Maria should continue in Possession of the Dutchy of Urbino. To this Consideration might be added that, while Pagolo stayed in the Camp with Lorenzo, he had been discontented that Renzo and Vitello had greater Authority than himself. The Memory of these Things was, perhaps, in a great measure the Cause of his future Calamities.

THE Duke, after this Agreement with the Perugians, directed his March towards Citta di Castello, where after some Excursions, with a Design to enter the Florentine Dominions on the Side of Borgo a San Sepolcro, the Danger of his own State induced him to take another Resolution. For the Legate Bibbiena having newly list of great Numbers of Italian Foot, and A. D. following the Resolution taken at Pesaro, ^{1517.} had with the rest of the Army approached Fossombrone, and planting his Batteries against it took it on the third Day, and plundered it. After this he proceeded to besiege Pergola, where on the second Day he was joined by Count Potenza with Four Hundred Spanish Lances sent by the King of Spain to the Pope's Assistance. There was not a Soldier in Pergola, but only a Spanish Captain with a Multitude of Peasants, who under a Terror began to treat of surrendering; but while they were treating, the Captain who stood upon the Wall having been wounded in the Face, the Soldiers gave the Assault without any regular Order or Command of their Officers, and took the Town by Force. From Pergola it was designed to march and lay Siege to Cagli, but Advice being received that Francesco Maria, being informed of the Loss of Fossombrone, was returning with great Speed into that State, it was resolved to retire. Wherefore on the same Night that the Legate received that Notice he decamped from Pergola, and ar-there that Night, when having fresh Intelligence that the Speed of the Enemy had been greater than had been imagined, and that they had dispatched away before the rest a Thousand Horse, each of whom had a Foot Soldier mounted behind him, in order to oblige them to march more slowly, that their Army might have Time to come up with them, they proceeded seven Miles forward to a Place called il Bosco, from whence the next Morning they departed before Day, and arrived in the Evening at Fano, having the Cavalry of the Enemy just at their Backs, so that if they had delayed to retire but four Hours longer, their Flight would have been difficult, or a Battle unavoidable.

BUT the Affairs of the Pope at this Juncture went on with no smoother a Current in other Transactions than in the Toils and Dangers of War, since he was in imminent Danger of his Life. For Alfonso Cardinal of Siena was highly provoked that the Pontiff, unmindful of the Fatigues

Fatigues and Dangers that Pandolfo Petrucci his Father had undergone for restoring him and his Brothers to the State of Florence, and of the Efforts used by himself, and in Conjunction with the other young Cardinals, in the Conclave for his Assumption to the Pontificate, had, in Recompense for such great Benefits, caused Borghese his Brother and himself to be driven out of Siena, whence being deprived of his patrimonial Estate he was unable to support with his wonted Splendor the Dignity of the Cardinalship. Burning therefore with Hatred, and almost reduced to Despair, he had formed a Design, prompted by his youthful Heat of Blood, to give him a mortal Blow with his own Hand; but being restrained more by the Danger and Difficulty than by the Heinousness of the Fact, and the inconceivable Offence it must give to all Christians for a Cardinal with his own Hands to murder a Pope, he had turned all his Thoughts upon sending him out of the World by Poison with the Assistance of Battista da Vercelli, a famous Surgeon and his intimate Friend. This Resolution, if so mad

A. D. ^{1517.} a Piece of Villainy deserves that Name, was to have been executed by the following Means: The Surgeon, as the only Way to introduce himself, was to exert his utmost in boasting his consummate Skill, that so the Pope, who, on account of an old Fistula in Ano, often used the Help of Men of his Profession, conceiving an Opinion of his Abilities, might send for him, and commit himself to his Care. But the Impatience of Alfonso threw many Difficulties in this Way of Proceeding; for while the Affair was protracted to some Length, the Cardinal, not knowing how to contain himself from launching out publicly into loud Complaints of the Pope's Ingratitude, rendered himself more and more obnoxious, and fell under a Suspicion that he was devising some Mischief against the State, till at length he was in a manner constrained for his own Security to depart from Rome, but left Antonio Nino his Secretary in that City. As there was a constant Intercourse maintained between him and his Secretary by Letters, Pope Leo discovered by some of them which were intercepted that a Plot was in Agitation tation against his Life. Wherefore he invited Alfonso to Rome under a Pretence that he designed to provide some Redress for his Affairs, and granted him a Pass, and with his own Mouth gave his Word of Honour to the Spanish Ambassador that he would not hurt him. Under this Security, though conscious of so great a Villainy, Alfonso imprudently appeared before the Pope, where he and Bandinello Cardinal de' Sauli, a Genoese, and who had also been a Favourer of the Promotion of Leo to the Pontificate, but was so intimate with the Cardinal of Siena that he was thought privy to the whole Affair, were ordered into Custody by the Pope in the same Presence Chamber, from whence they were committed Prisoners to the Castle of Sant' Angelo. Immediate Orders were also given for imprisoning Battista da Vercelli the Surgeon, who was then practising his Art in Florence, and sending him without Delay to Rome. The Spanish Ambassador used his Endeavours by the most ardent Complaints and Protests to have Alfonso set at Liberty, alledging that the Pope's Word given to him as he was the Am-

But the Pontiff answered that no Pass how ample soever, and full of strong and special Clauses, was ever intended for a Security in a Crime that affected the Life of the Pope, unless it had been nominally specified in it: That there was the same Exemption in the Case of Poisoning, which was so greatly repugnant to divine and human Laws, and to the common Sentiments of Mankind, that it had Need of a particular and precise Expression. The Pope appointed in Chief for their Examination Mario Perusco, a Roman, an Attorney of the Exchequer, by whom being examined with Rigour they confessed the Plot as devised by Alfonso with the Privy of Bandinello. This Confession was confirmed by Battista da Vercelli, and by Pocointesta da Bagnacavallo, who had long been Captain of the Guard stationed in the Square of Siena, under Pandolfo the Father, and Borghese the Brother of the Cardinal; which two Criminals were publicly quartered. But after this Confession in the next Consistory there there was apprehended and sent also to the ^{A. D.} said Castle Rafaello Riario, Cardinal of San ^{1517.} Giorgio, and Chamberlain of the Apostolic See, who for his Riches, the Magnificence of his Court, and the long Time he had been in that high Station, was without Doubt the principal Cardinal of the College. He confessed that the Plot had never been communicated to him, but that the Cardinal of Siena, in his Complaints and Menaces against the Pope, had several Times thrown out Speeches by which he might have understood that he had it in his Thoughts, whenever he had an Opportunity, to do some Violence to the Person of his Holiness.

THE Pope after this in another Consistory, in which the Cardinals, not accustomed to be violated, sat under great Pope Dejection and Terror, complained of the ^{complaints} barbarous and wicked Conspiracy against ^{in Consistory.} his Life by those who by their high Dignity and Station, as principal Members of the Apostolic See, were above all others obliged to defend it. He pathetically lamented his Misfortune, and that it had

A. D. 1517. availed him nothing that he had been, and continued to be, kind and beneficent to every one, and even to a Degree that many had blamed him for it: Adding that there were yet other Cardinals concerned in the Guilt, to whom, if they freely confessed their Fault before the Consistory was dismissed, he was ready to shew Mercy, and to pardon them; but after that Consistory was ended he would use all the Severity of Justice against every one who should be found an Accomplice in so great a Crime. On these Words Adriano Cardinal of Corneto, and Francesco Soderini Cardinal of Volterra, kneeling before the Seat of the Pontiff, said that the Cardinal of Siena had made use of the same Expressions to them which he had used to the Cardinal of San Giorgio.

THE Examinations being finished and published in Consistory, Alfonso and Bandinello were by Sentence given in a public Consistory deprived of the Dignity of the Cardinalship, degraded, and delivered over to the Secular Court. Alfonso the next next Night was secretly strangled in Prison, A. D. but the Punishment of Bandinello was by ^{1517.} the Pope's Grace changed into perpetual Cardinal Imprisonment, though not long after the Petrucci Pontiff not only freed him out of Prison, strangled. but on the Payment of a certain Sum of Money restored him to the Cardinalship, even though he had juster Reason to be angry with him, because he had constantly participated of his Favours and Benefits, and had no other Cause for his Disaffection than his great Intimacy with the Cardinal of Siena, and a Resentment that the Cardinal de' Medici should be preferred before him in a Competition for certain Benefices.

 There were not wanting, however, some, perhaps malignant, Interpreters, who were of Opinion that before he was out of Custody the Pope had ordered a Potion to be given him of that Kind of Poison which does not kill suddenly, but wastes away in Process of Time the Life of the Patient.
 With the Cardinal of San Giorgio, the Pontiff having a Respect for his Age, Authority, and the great Friendship that had long subsisted between them before his Pontificate, dealt more gently because his Offence was less, though the Laws made and interpreted by Princes for the Security of their States intend that in the Crime of High Treason the Punishment of Death should be inflicted not only on the Plotter, but on whoever is privy or any Way consenting to a Conspiracy against the State, and much more when the Life of the Prince is concerned. Wherefore though, for maintaining the Authority of Severity in the same Sentence, he was deprived of the Cardinalship, he was almost as soon, on obliging himself to pay a large Sum of Money, restored by an Act of Grace, except to his active and passive Vote, in which also within a Year he was reinstated. Adriano and Volterra were not molested, except that they privately paid a certain Sum of Money; but neither of them believing that they could stay in Rome with Security or with convenient Dignity, Volterra with the Pope's Leave retired to Fondi, where he lived under the Protection of Prospero Colonna till Leo's Death; and as for Adriano, he left Rome in private, but, whatever became of him, he was never,

THIS melancholy Event obliged the Pope to think on a Creation of new Cardinals, since he was sensible that almost the whole College, by the Punishment of their Brethren, and for other Reasons, were greatly disaffected to him: But in this Transaction he proceeded so immoderately that he declared in one Morning in Consistory, the College consenting out of Fear, and not of free Will, no fewer than One and Thirty Cardinals; in which numerous Promotion he found Means to answer several Ends, and to chuse out of all Ranks and Qualities; for he promoted two of his Sister's Sons, and some of those who had before and since his Pontificate been devoted to his Service, and acceptable to the Cardinal de' Medici and himself on several Accounts, but were in no other Respect capable of so great a Dignity. He satisfied also, by creating so many Cardinals, the Desires of great Princes, in advancing them at their Recommendation. Many of them he created

A. D. 1517. for Money, finding himself exhausted and in preſſing Neceſſity; ſome of them were in great Reputation for their Learning, and Three were the Generals, or Superiors of the Orders of St. Auſtin, St. Dominic, and St. Francis, and, what is very rare in one and the ſame Promotion, two of the Family of Trivulzi, to which he was induced becauſe one of them was his Chamberlain, and from a Deſire to ſatisfy Gianjacopo, and the other was in Repute for his Learning, which was aſſiſted with a Sum of Money. But what occaſioned greater Admiration was the Promotion of Franciotto Orſino and Pompeo Colonna, and five other Romans of the principal Families that followed this or that Faction, in which he took his Meaſures contrary to the Reſolutions of his Predeceſſor, but eſteemed imprudent, and not very fortunate in the Event to his Friends and Family. For the Greatneſs of the Roman Barons being conſtantly attended with the Depreſſion and Diſquietude of the Pontiffs, Julius, on a Failure of the antient Cardinals of thoſe Families which Alexander VI. had bitterly perſecuted that he might deprive them of their their States, had never consented to re-^{A. D. 1517.} place them out of the same Stock; but Leo did the contrary, and the more immoderately because it could not be said that he was induced by personal Merit, for Franciotto was promoted from the Profession of Arms to the Dignity of the Cardinalship, and against Pompeo it might be justly objected that, though he were a Bishop, he had taken Occasion from the Sickneſs of Pope Julius to excite the Roman People to an Insurrection against the sacerdotal Government, for which Reason that Pontiff had deprived him of the episcopal Dignity.

IN the mean time Francesco Maria,^{Motions of the Duke of Urbino.} who after the Retreat, or rather Flight of the Enemy, had never been able to bring them to an Engagement, being at the Head of a very potent Army, for on the Report that he met with no Resistance in the Field, he had a continual Accession of fresh Troops allured by the Hopes of Plunder, entered the Marca, where Fabrizio and many other Towns compounded with him for Contributions in Money to

A. D. 1517. to redeem themselves from Plunder and the Ravaging of their Territories ; some other Towns were sacked, and amongst them the City of Iesi while the Inhabitants were treating of a Composition. After this the Duke with his Army approached Ancona, for the Defence of which City the Legate had sent some Troops; here he spent several Days to the great Detriment of his Affairs, because of the Loss of Time, not in fighting, but in treating of an Agreement with the Anconitans, who at last to save their Harvest, which was just ripe, paid him Eight Thousand Ducats, not transgressing in other Respects their accustomed Obedience to the Church. He then made an Attack on the City of Osimo with little Success, and at length sat down before the Town of Corinaldo, in which were Two Hundred foreign Foot, who in Conjunction with the Townsmen made so gallant a Defence, that after a Siege of two and twenty Days, despairing of Conquest, he decamped and marched off with great Diminution of the Terror of that Army, which had not taken one Town of those that had refused to make a Composition.

position. This ill Success was not owing ^{A. D.} to the Unskilfulness of the Generals, or ^{1517.} to the Cowardice of the Soldiers, but purely to the Want of Cannon, of which they had very few, and those but small Pieces, and they were almost destitute of Powder. It had, however, been found necessary to give a voluntary Demonstration of their Constancy and Valour to those Towns which would not submit to them, because the Generals of the Ecclesiastical Army, the Chief of whom was the Count of Potenza, though they had sent Troops to ravage the Country home to the Walls of Urbino, and Sise, being returned from Citta di Castello into Romagna had afterwards entered into Monte Feltro, and taken by Force Secchiano and some other small Towns, were all assembled and encamped five Miles from Pesaro, with a Resolution not to succour any Place, and to make no Motion, unless it should be necessary in order to retreat. For if their Measures had succeeded so unhappily when they were so much superior in Force, they could not expect that now, when they found themselves so greatly inferior in Infantry,

In this Resolution they acted in Conformity to the Will of the Pontiff, and were confirmed in it by their Hopes of the Arrival of Six Thousand Swiss, whom the Pope, following the Advice of the King of France, had sent Orders to enlist. For that King, after the Confederacy was made, was desirous that the Pope should get the Victory, though he entertained the same Suspicions of him that he had before, his Jealousy being kept alive by the Accounts which were given him by Galeazzo Visconti and Marc' Antonio Colonna, the First of whom being restored from Exile to his Country, and the other, because he did not think himself sufficiently recompensed for his Services by the Emperor, had entered themselves, on honourable Conditions, into the King's Pay, and had related that the Pope had taken great Pains to set the Emperor and the Swiss against him. But the King was much more concerned at the Pontiff's privately engaging in a new Confederacy with the Emperor and the Kings of Spain and England, which though it A. D. 1517. were lawful for him to do, because it was only defensive, yet gave him no little Disturbance, and he was desirous that the Pope should be delivered from the War for Fear lest, if he found him too backward in his Assistance, he should enter into a stricter Alliance with the said Princes; besides he began to be jealous and uneasy at the Prosperity of that Army; the Strength of which consisted in Spanish and German Infantry. Wherefore he not only advised the Pope to provide himself with Swiss Foot, but offered to send him a fresh Supply of Three Hundred Lances under Thomas de Foix, Lord of l'Escud, and Brother of Odet, intimating to him that besides the Valour and Reputation of the Person he would be instrumental for causing Francesco Maria to be deserted by the Gascons, with whom those Brothers de Foix, who were by Birth of the noblest Blood in Gascony, had a great Authority.

 The Pope had accepted that Offer, but with great Suspense of Mind, for he stood in Doubt, as he did before, of the King's Intentions, of which his Suspicions had

A. D. been increased by the Flight of the Gascon

Foot, which he was afraid had proceeded from some secret Contrivance of Lautrech. Certain it is that whoever observed the Steps of Princes in those Times might have plainly discovered that no Endearments, no Benefits, nor Tyes whatsoever were sufficient to remove that Distrust which they had conceived one of another; for there was not only a reciprocal Jealousy between the King of France and the Pontiff, but the King of Spain, understanding that there was a Discourse of the March of the Swiss and of Thomas de Foix, was not without Apprehensions that the Pope and the King in Conjunction had formed a Design to deprive him of the Kingdom of Naples. This Disposition, it is thought, was advantageous to the Pope's Affairs, for each of the Princes, to avoid giving him any Cause or Pretence to justify himself for renouncing their Friendship, was solicitous to confirm and secure him in their Interests by Favours and Assistance.

BUT Francesco Maria, after his Departure from Corinaldo, returned into the State

State of Urbino, to protect his People in A. D.
1517. gathering in their Harvest, whence, being mightily desirous, as he had always been, of making himself Master of Pesaro, in which was the Count of Potenza with his Troops, he led his Army before the Walls of that City, and put some small Ships to Sea to cut them short of Provisions; but on the other Side the People at Rimini fitted out Sixteen Vessels, consisting of Barks, Brigantines, and other small Craft, and as soon as they were ready sent them as a Convoy to some Barks bound for Pesaro with Provisions, where encountering with the Fleet of Francesco Maria, they sunk the Admiral, and took all the rest, on which the Duke despairing of the Conquest of Pesaro marched off. In the mean time L'Escud put himself on his March with the Three Hundred Lances, but the Swiss were delayed, because the Cantons refused to grant any Troops to the Pope before they were paid their old Arrears; in which Disposition they continuing inflexible, and the Pontiff on account of his vast Expences unable to satisfy them, his Agents, after wasting many Days in vain

Decree Two Thousand private Men of that Nation, and Four Thousand Germans and Grisons. These Troops being at last arrived at Rimini, and quartered in the Suburbs, which are divided by the River from the rest of the City, and surrounded by a Wall, Francesco Maria entered by Night under the Arches of that beautiful Marble Bridge which joins the Suburbs to the City, but could not pass the River because it was swollen by the Inundation of the Sea. There was a sharp Conflict between his Troops and the Foot quartered in the Suburbs, in which Gaspari, Captain of the Pope's Guards, who had conducted them thither, was killed; but the Loss on the Duke's Side was greater, Balastichino and Vinea, Spanish Captains, were killed, Federigo da Bozzolo was wounded, and Francesco Maria received a Musket Shot in his Cuirass. After this the Army directed its March towards Tuscany, guided rather by Necessity than Hope, for in a State so much exhausted so great a Body of Forces could not expect to find Sustenance. In Tuscany the Duke rested rested some Days between the Pieve of Santo Stefano, Borgo a San Sepolcro and Angbiara, Towns of the Florentines, and taking Possession of Montedoglio, a weak Place, and of small Importance, he gave a very long Assault to Angbiara, a Town better defended by the Valour and Loyalty of the Inhabitants than by the Strength of its Walls or any other Fortification. Being repulsed at Angbiara he retired under the Appennine, and encamped between Borgo and Citta di Castello, where he received four Pieces of Artillery from Mercatello, and posted himself half a Mile from Borgo on the Road to Urbino, uncertain how to proceed; for the Enemy having marched behind him into Tuscany, a good Body of Italian Soldiers had taken Possession of Borgo; in Citta di Castello was Vitello with another Body of Troops, and Angbiara, the Pieve of Santo Stefano, and the other neighbouring Towns were taken up by the German, Corfican, Grison and Swiss Infantry. There came also, though later, Lorenzo de' Medici from Florence to Borgo, where Francesco Maria remained many Days without Action, in which Situation

A. D.
 1517. he began at length to be in great Distress for Provisions, nor did he see any present Hopes of doing any thing to good Effect, since his Army, which was obliged to subsist on Prey and Rapine, was become as much dreaded by Friends as Enemies, and he himself had but a melancholy Prospect of his Affairs; and the Troops that followed him receiving no Pay, and having no Hopes of subsisting by Plunder much longer, because they were not provided with Artillery and Ammunition proper for forcing of Towns, and while they were labouring also under a Want of Provisions seeing their Enemies by the Favour and Countenance of Princes increased in Strength and Reputation, began to be tired with the Length of the War, having no Room to hope for a happy Issue, either by a speedy Battle, or by protracting the War to a greater Length of Time.

THE Pope on the other Side was in as bad a Condition, exhausted of Money, little able of himself to provide Necessaries in his Camp, and as distrustful as ever of the Faith of Kings, especially of the King of France, because he was very backward ^{A. D.} in furnishing the Subsidy of Money due to ^{1517.} him by the Convention, and L'Escud, who had by the Pope's Direction stopped in Romagna, refused to send Part of his Troops into Tuscany, declaring that he would not divide his Forces. Wherefore, not only before the Armies had passed the Appennine, but much more after Affairs had been reduced to the present Situation, there had been several Conferences about an Accommodation held between the Legate and Francesco Maria in Conjunction with his Generals, L'Escud, and Don Hugo de Moncada, Viceroy of Sicily, who had Orders from the Catholic King for that Purpose, assisting at them; but nothing had hitherto succeeded on account of the hard Conditions proposed by Francesco Maria. At last the Spanish Foot, induced by the Difficulties which presented themselves, and at the Instances of Don Hugo, who came over to the Camp, and adding Menaces to Authority represented to them that it was the peremptory Will of the King of Spain, they inclined to an Agreement, to which Francesco Maria, though unwillingly, the Substance of these Articles was drawing up in a more ample Form in Writing, Francesco Maria insisted on inserting certain Words, importing that it was the Spaniards who obliged themselves to deliver up the State of Urbino to the Pope. This being refused by the Spaniards as contrary to their Honour, they fell at Variance, whence Francesco Maria suspecting that they would sell him to the Pope, withdrew on a sudden, with Part of the light Horse, and with the Italian, Gascon and German Foot to the Pieues of Sestina. The Spaniards as soon as the Agreement was fulfilled, and they had received the Money that was promised them, set out on their March for the Kingdom of Naples, to the Number of about Six Hundred Horse and Four Thousand Foot. The other Foot also went off, after they had received the Reward of their Perfidy, and only the Italian Foot, to whom nothing was given or promised, remained behind. Reflexions on the War.

THUS ended the War of the State of Urbino, after it had lasted eight Months with vast Expence and Disgrace to the Conquerors; for it cost the Pontiff Eight Hundred Thousand Ducats, the greater Part of which, through the Power which he had in their City, was expended by the Republic of Florence. And the Generals who had the chief Management of the Affair were universally charged with very great Cowardice, and very disorderly Conduct; and by some with malignant Intentions: For in the Beginning of the War, when the Forces of Lorenzo were very powerful, and those of the Enemy but weak, they never knew how to improve any Opportunity, either by open Valour, or provident Care and Industry. From the Want of many Things necessary in a Camp, till at last when Fortune had a Mind to sport herself with their Blunders, she raised such a Multiplicity of Disorders, as translated the Seat of the War into such a Place that the Pontiff, who had discovered a Conspiracy against his Life, finding himself attacked in the Dominions of the Church, and sometimes under no small Apprehensions for the State of Florence, was necessitated to solicit by Intreaties, and by new Obligations, the Assistance of every Power, and yet had no other Way to free himself from his manifold Distresses but by paying with his own Money those Troops of the Enemy's Army, which had either been the Original of the War, or which had been first listed in his Service, and, after a Multitude of Extortions, had basely revolted against him.

TOWARDS the End of this Year the King of

The Venetians also anew confirmed for two Years their defensive League with the King of France, and while they were in close Alliance with that Prince they had but little Regard for the Friendship of all the rest, and carried their Neglect so far that they had not as yet sent to pay Obedience to the Pontiff, who was much blamed for sending Altobello, Bishop of Pola, Ambassador to Venice, as a Step unworthy of his Majesty.

1518. IN the following Year, 1518, Italy had the Happiness, unknown for many Years past, not to be sensible of the least Movement of War, and, what is more, the same pacific Disposition appeared in all the Christian Princes, between whom, at the Motion of the Pontiff, Consultations were held, held, though more with specious Reasonings than solid Counfels, about a general Expedition of all Christendom againſt Selymus the Sultan of the Turks, who had the Year before increas'd his Grandeur to ſuch a Degree, that, conſidering his Power, and no leſs his Ambition of Empire, together with his Valour and Fierceneſs, there was juſt Reason to fear that if the Chriſtians did not prevent him by being the Aggreſſors, it would not be long before he turned his victorious Arms againſt them. For Selymus, having learnt that Bajazet his Father, who was now grown very old, deſigned to ſettle the Succeſſion of the Empire on Achomates his eldeſt Son, rebelled againſt him, and conſtrained him by Force of Arms, and by bribing the Ja-nizaries, to reſign the Throne to his Poſſeſſion; and it was univerſally believed that, in order to be abſolutely ſecure of him, he impiouſly procured his Death by 1518. and every one that remained of that Stock, was of such a cruel and unrelenting Temper that it is believed he had it sometimes in his Thoughts to destroy his only Son Solyman.

HAVING laid these Foundations he went on War after War, and having overcome and subdued the Aladolites, a fierce mountainous People, he proceeded with his Army into Persia against the Sophy, and coming to a Battle with him defeated him, and took the City of Tauris the Seat of that Empire, with the greater Part of Persia, which he was forced to abandon, not by the Valour of the Enemies, who doubting their Ability to resist his Army were retired into wild and mountainous Places, but for Want of Provisions because it had been a very barren Year. After his Return from that Expedition to Constantinople he punished many of his Soldiers for raising a Sedition, and spent some Months in recruiting his Army; then, pretending that his Design was to return and make a Conquest of Persia, he turned his Arms against against the Soldan of Syria and Egypt, a Prince not only of very antient Dignity, and highly revered by those of that Religion, but also very powerful by the Extent of his Dominions, his great Revenues, and the military Establishment of the Mamaluks, who by their Arms had kept Possession of that Empire with very great Reputation for these Three Hundred Years. For the Administration was in the Hands of Soldans, who ascended to the highest Station not by Succession but by Election, and to which none were exalted but Persons of known Valour, and who had passed through all the military Degrees to the Government of Provinces and Armies; and the Strength of their Military consisted not in mercenary and foreign Soldiers, but in chosen Men, who were taken when Children from the neighbouring Provinces, and having been bred up for many Years with a sparing Diet, inured to hard Labour, and continual Employment in Arms, in Riding, and in all the Exercises belonging to military Discipline, were afterwards enrolled in the Order of Mamaluks, which Honour descended not from Hand to Hand to the Sons of deceased Mamalucs, but to others, who in their Childhood were taken for Slaves, and had been instructed in the same Arts, and trained up in the same Discipline which had made Way by Degrees for their Predecessors. This Militia, in Number not above Sixteen or Eighteen Thousand, kept under very severe Subjection all the People of Syria and Egypt, who were not allowed to keep Arms, nor to ride Horses, and being Men of great Valour and Fierceness, and who made War on their own Account, because the Soldans were chosen out of their Number, and by themselves, and they were in Possession of the Honours, Profits, and Administration of that vastly plentiful and opulent Empire, had not only subdued many of the neighbouring Nations, and beaten the Arabs, but had several Wars with the Turks, in which they had been often victorious, but seldom or never overcome by them.

AGAINST this formidable Body it was that Selymus then moved with his Army, and after he had given them several Defeats feats in the open Field, in which the Soldan was killed, and then taken in Battle the other Soldan his Successor, whom he put to Death publicly with an ignominious Punishment, and made a vast Slaughter, and even in a manner extinguished the very Name of the Mamaluks, and taken Possession of Cairo, a very populous City, and the Residence of the Soldans, he made himself Master of all Syria and Egypt in a very short Space of Time; so that from this great and sudden Increase of Empire, and almost doubling his Revenues, besides a Removal of those Obstacles arising from the Emulation of such potent and reputable Neighbours, he was not without Reason become formidable to the Christians. And they had the juster Grounds for their Apprehensions, because with so great an Eminence of Power and Valour was joined an ardent Desire of Empire, and of transmitting a most glorious Name to Posterity by his Victories. In this Disposition he would frequently read, as it was reported, the Actions of Alexander the Great, and of Julius Cæsar, and wonderfully fret and torment himself that his Exploits were no way comparable to the many Victories and Triumphs of those Heroes. And by his continual reviewing and putting in Order his Armies and Militia, building a vast Number of new Vessels, and making new Provisions of Things necessary for a War, it was apprehended that he had a Design to attack, as soon as he was prepared, some said, the Island of Rhodes, the Bulwark of Christendom on the Eastern Parts, or, as others imagined, the Kingdom of Hungary, which was formerly dreaded by the Turks for the Fierceness of its Inhabitants, but was at present but in a weak Condition, being in the Hands of a King who was in his Minority, and governed by the Prelates and Barons of the Kingdom, who were divided among themselves. Others affirmed that his Designs were all bent upon Italy, which he was emboldened to attack from the Discord of the Princes, and his knowing how much it had been shattered by the long Wars, to which he was incited also by the Memory of his Grandfather Mahomet, who with much less Power, and with a small Fleet sent to the Kingdom of Naples, had by a sudden Attack made himself himself Master of the City of Otranto, and opened himself, if he had not been surprised by Death, a Door, and established himself in a Seat, from whence he might at all Times annoy the Italians.

THE Pope, therefore, with the whole Court of Rome, terrified at such great Success, and in order to provide against so threatening a Danger, willing to shew his Readiness to have Recourse in the first Place to the divine Assistance, decreed throughout the City of Rome most devout Processions; on which Leo himself went barefooted. After this turning his Thoughts and Cares on human Helps and Means, he wrote Briefs to all the Christian Princes; admonishing them of so great a Danger; and exhorting them to lay aside their Divisions and Contentions, and to shew their Readiness to attend to the Defence of Religion and of the common Safety, which were continually exposed to very great Hazards if they did not all resolve, with united Hearts and Forces, to transfer the War into the Turkish Empire, and attack the Enemies in their own Dwellings. this Affair, after examining many Opinions of military Men, and of Persons acquainted with the Countries, the Disposition of the Provinces, and of the Forces and Arms of that Empire, it was resolved that it was necessary to make very large Provisions of Money, by a voluntary Contribution of the Princes, and by a general Tax to be laid on all the People of Christendom: That Cæsar, attended by the Cavalry of the Hungarians and Poles, warlike Nations, and exercised in continual Wars against the Turks, and with an Army suitable to so great an Undertaking, consisting of German Horse and Foot, should fall down the Danube into Bosnia, antiently called Mysia, and from thence penetrate into Thracia, and advance to Constantinople, the Seat of the Ottoman Empire: That the King of France with all the Forces of his Kingdom, of the Venetians, and of the other Powers of Italy, accompanied by the Swiss Infantry, should transport himself from the Port of Brindisi to Albania, an easy and very short Passage, in order to attack Greece, a Country full of Christian Inhabitants, and, because of the Severity of the Turkish Government, very disposed to revolt : That the Kings of Spain, Portugal and England should join their Fleets at Cartagena and the neighbouring Ports, and with Two Hundred Sail, full of Spanish Foot and other Soldiers, direct their Course to the Streights of Gallipoli, and after they had made themselves Masters of the Dardanells, or Castles situated at the Mouth of the Streights of Constantinople, proceed and attack that Capital; and the Pope, with an Hundred Ships of War, should sail from Ancona on the same Voyage. With such Preparations covering both Land and Sea, and attacking in so many Quarters the State of the Turks, who lay the principal Stress of their Defence in the Field, there was Reason to hope, especially with the divine Assistance, that so pious a War would have a very happy Issue.

To set on Foot a Treaty for these Purposes, or at least to avoid the Imputation

A. D. of being wanting to the Duty of a Pontiff, 1518. Leo, after first founding the Minds of the Princes, published in Consistory an universal Truce for Five Years between all the Christian Potentates, under the Penalty of most grievous Censures against any one who should contravene it. And that all Matters relating to so great an Undertaking, on which he was continually consulting with the Ambassadors of the Princes, might be accepted and seriously debated, he appointed Legates, as the Cardinal of San Sisto to Cæsar, the Cardinal of Santa Maria in Portico to the King of France, Cardinal Egidio to the King of Spain, and Lorenzo Cardinal Campeggio to the King of England, all Men of Authority or Experience in Affairs, and recommended either by the Fame of their Learning, or their Intimacy with the Pontiff. But though Negotiations for these Purposes were begun with great Expectations, and the universal Truce had been accepted by all, and every one with ostentatious and magnific Speeches professed themselves ready in so just a Cause to engage with all their Forces against the Turks, if they had the Concurrence of the rest, yet as the Danger was by all accounted uncertain, ^{A. D. 1518.} and at a great Distance, and concerned the States of one more than those of the other, and as it was very difficult, and required a long Time to introduce so universal an Ardor and Union, private Interests and Conveniencies got the upper Hand so far that not only these Designs ^{Scheme abortive.} were never in a Forwardness to be put in Execution, but hardly ever came under Debate but in a slighting Manner, and as it were out of Ceremony, it being the Nature of Mankind that those Objects which at first Sight appear very dreadful to us become every Day less formidable, and make weaker Impressions, so that if the Terror be not renewed by fresh Incidents, they have a Tendency, in a long Process of Time, to lull us into a State of Security. And this Negligence of public and immoderate Concern for private Affairs was not long after confirmed by the Death of Selymus, who after a tedious and ^{Death of Selymus.} wasting Disorder, which suspended the Preparations of War, departed this Life, leaving that great Empire to his Son Solyman, man, young in Years, and reputed of a milder Disposition, and not inclined to War, but his future Conduct demonstrated the contrary.

ably.

AT this Time there seemed to be an extraordinary Friendship and Harmony between the Pontiff and the King of France, for the King made a Match between Lorenzo the Pontiff's Nephew and Magdalen a young Lady of the noble House of *Boulogne, with a yearly Revenue of Ten Thousand Crowns, Part of which was of the royal Bounty, and the rest her patrimonial Estate; and the King having a Son born, the Pontiff desired to stand Godfather. Lorenzo on this Occasion disposed himself to go and be joined in Matrimony to the new Spouse, and hastening his Departure went Post to the Court of France, where he was highly carested and honoured by the King, with whom, by professing himself wholly devoted to his Service, and promising to follow his Fortune

* Lorenzo had by this Lady a Daughter called Katherine, who was afterwards by Pope Clement VII. married to Henry Successor to his Father Francis in the Throne of France, and was Mother of Charles IX.

Fortune in all Events, he greatly ingratiated himself. He brought with him to the King a Brief of the Pontiff, which granted him Leave to make what Use he pleased of the Money arising from the Tenth and the Crusades, till there was Occasion to spend it in a War against the Turks, on his promising to restore it at any Time when it should be necessary to employ it on the Purposes for which it had been repositied; wherefore Fifty Thousand Crowns of it were converted to Lorenzo's Use. The King also, who had hitherto dissembled his Dissatisfaction with the Pope for not performing the Promise which he had made him by Brief, of the Restitution of Modena and Reggio to the Duke of Ferrara, though the Term of Seven Months was expired, knowing that he could not give the Pontiff so much Distaste as by insisting on that Restitution, and paying, as it often happens, more Regard to those in higher Rank than to Inferiors, put the Brief of the Promise into the Hands of Lorenzo.

THE Venetians also much about the same Time, by the Mediation of the King of France, prolonged the Truce with Cæsar for Five Years, on Condition of paying him each of these Years Twenty Thousand Crowns, and that the Exiles who had followed Cæsar should receive a fourth Part of the yearly Revenue of the Estates which they had before enjoyed, by which Means their Share, according to the Rates, would be Five Thousand Crowns; and Cæsar, if they had given him a larger Sum, might perhaps have been induced to make a Peace. But a Truce was more acceptable to the King of France, because the Venetians not being as yet wholly secure would have the greater Reason to set a Value on his Friendship, and because Cæsar would have no Power with the Money which he would receive of them to stir up Innovations.

Establishment of the Agreement it was confirmed by a new Contract of Affinity. For the King of England engaged to give his only Daughter, to whom, in Default of other Children, the Succession to the Crown, ought, as it was expected, to fall, to the Dauphin, eldest Son to the King of France, with a Dowry of Four Hundred Thousand Ducats, both the Parties being of so tender an Age that infinite Accidents might happen before they were of Years sufficient for Consummation of Matrimony. A Defensive League was made between them, in which were nominated by the principal contracting Parties Cæsar and the King of Spain, in case they ratified within a certain Time. The King of England was obliged to restore Tournay, the Keeping of which was very expensive, and was to receive of Francis for the Money he had laid out Sixty Thousand Ducats in Hand, and to acknowledge the Receipt of Three Hundred Thousand more in Dowry with his Daughter-in-law, besides paying Three Hundred Thousand Ducats more within Twelve Years, engaging also to restore

IN this peaceful Situation of Affairs in Italy and beyond the Mountains Gian-jacopo da Trivulzi alone was suffered to enjoy no Rest, no Respect being paid to his Age, now almost decrepit, nor to his military Conduct and Bravery, so often exerted in the Service of the House of France. For having to deal with the subtle Artifices of his Rivals, and the Malice of Lautrech, who opposed him in many Points, of which Contentions his own ambitious and restless Temper might perhaps in some measure be the Cause, he was fallen into Disgrace with the King, who suspected that he and his House, thro' the Interest of the Guelf Faction, and the Memory of antient Endearments, were become too much in Favour with the Venetians, who had constituted Teodoro da Trivulzi Commander of their Forces, and had lately listd into their Service Renato of the same Family. Wherefore Galeazzo Visconti, by the Death of Francesco Bernardino Visconti, becoming Head of the Ghibelline Faction, the King had invested him with the Order of St. Michael,

A. D. Michael, and allowed him a Pension, in 1518. order to set him up in Opposition to Trivulzi with the greater Authority, and his Majesty himself and Lautrech countenanced his Proceedings on all Occasions. This Management could not pass without humbling and depressing Trivulzi, who was too impatient to dissemble, and by his frequent Complaints became every Day more hated and more suspected. But Lautrech and the rest who calumniated him with the King had the fairer Occasion given them by his making himself a free Burgher of Switzerland, as if he had intended to use the Assistance of the Swiss for supporting himself against the King, and perhaps aspired to greater Matters. To justify himself from these Calumnies, so old as he was, he took a Journey into France; but not only Lautrech as soon as he was departed, by the King's Orders, arrested and put under honourable Custody his Wife, and his Grandson by his only Son the Count of Musocco lately deceased, but he himself was so far from meeting with a favourable and honourable Reception from the King as usual, that that he was reproached by him with making himself a Swiss, and told that nothing restrained his Justice from punishing him according to his Deserts, but the Fame that was universally spread, though exaggerated beyond the Truth, of his Merits towards the Crown of France. He was necessitated therefore to retract what he had done *, and a few Days after following the Court he fell sick at Chartres, and departed the Stage of this World. He was a Person of universal Reputation, as had been confirmed by manifold Experience, for his great Knowledge in military Discipline, but was through the whole Course of his Life in Subjection to the Inconstancy of Fortune, who sometimes lifted him up to the Top of Prosperity, at other Times depressed him under a Load of Misfortunes, so that nothing could be more properly said of him than what he caused to be inscribed on his Monument, "Within this Grave lies at Rest Gianjacopo da Trivulzi, who before never knew Rest."

* To renounce his Swiss Burghership.

 sons, treated with the Electors about chusing one of them King of the Romans, which Dignity whoever has obtained immediately on the Death of the Emperor succeeds to the Empire without another Election or Confirmation. And because there is no arriving at that Dignity before he who has been chosen to the Empire has obtained the Imperial Crown, he solicited the Pontiff to make a new Precedent, and cause him to be crowned in Germany by the Hands of some Cardinals constituted Apostolical Legates for that Purpose. And though Cæsar had at first desired that this Dignity should be conferred on his Grandson Ferdinand, because he thought it convenient that, since the elder Brother was arrived at such a Pitch of Greatness, and Master of so many States, the other should support himself with that Degree, and judged that in order to maintain his House in the greater Splendor, and to provide against any ill Accidents that might befall the Person of the elder Brother, it were better to have two great Persons in his Family than one alone, yet being stimu-

lated to the contrary by his Confidants and the Cardinal of Sion, and by all those who hated or dreaded the Power of France, he rejected his first Resolution, and turned all his Endeavours to procure the Promotion of the King of Spain to that Dignity. These Counsellors demonstrated to him that it would be much more conducive to the Exaltation of the House of Austria that the whole Power should be accumulated on one Person, for by dividing it into Parts they would be render'd less able to accomplish their Designs: That the Greatness of Charles was built on such ample and solid Foundations that by adding to it the Imperial Dignity it was to be hoped that all Italy and a great Part of Christendom might be reduced into one Monarchy; an Event, which would not only conduce to the Greatness of his Descendants, but also to the Quiet of their Subjects, and, with Regard to the Affairs of the Infidels, to the Benefit of the whole Christian Commonwealth; and that it was his Business and Duty to study the Augmentation and Exaltation of the Imperial Dignity, which had been so many Years vested in his Person and in the Family of Austria, and which had hitherto, for Want of Power in him and his Predecessors, been greater in Name and Title than in Substance and Effect; and there were no Hopes that it would ever raise itself, or be restored to its antient Splendor but by transferring it on the Person of Charles, and uniting it with his Power: That an Opportunity for it offered itself to him from the Order and Course of Nature and Fortune, which it was his Duty not to hinder but rather to promote: That it appeared by the Records of the antient Emperors that Cæsar Augustus and many of his Successors, on a Failure of Children or Descendants of the same Race, being apprehensive that the Dignity which resided in their Persons would be subverted or diminished, had searched out Men remote from their Kindred, or even no way belonging to them, and made them their Successors by means of Adoption: That there was the modern Example of the Catholic King, who loved Ferdinand as his own Son, having bred him under his continual Care at his own Court, and had not so much as found from him but little Obedience to his Precepts; yet he had no Compassion on the Poverty of him whom he loved as his Son, nor bequeathed him any Share of those many States which he possessed, not even of those which he had himself acquired, and were consequently in his own Disposal, but left all to one whom he hardly knew but as a Stranger.

 They put Cæsar in Mind also that the same King had always advised him to acquire new States for Ferdinand, but to leave the Imperial Dignity to Charles; and now it appeared that the more to ag-grandize his Successor, he had, with a Resolution possibly condemned by many, and perhaps unjust, but moved by no other Reason than this, deprived his own Family of so noble and illustrious a Kingdom as Aragon, and consented, contrary to the Desire of most People, that the Name of his House should be extinguished and annihilated.

tremely concerned that to so many Kingdoms and States of the King of Spain should be added the Imperial Dignity, which would by that Means resume its antient Vigour and become so powerful as to be formidable to all the World. Wherefore he endeavoured to defeat the Design by treating privately with the Electors, and made Instances to the Pontiff to refuse making a new Precedent by sending the Crown to Cæsar; and he had sent Ambassadors to the Venetians to solicit their Concurrence in the Opposition, admonishing both them and the Pontiff of the Danger which would arise from so exorbitant a Greatness. But a great Part of the Electors were gained over to Cæsar, and they were already in a manner secure of the Money which was promised them for this Election by the King of Spain, who had for that Purpose sent Two Hundred Thousand Ducats into Germany; and they could not with Decency, nor perhaps without Danger of giving Offence, having Regard to past Examples, deny him his Request; nor was it believed that the Pontiff, though it might be very disagreeable to him, would refuse to grant that Cæsar ^{A. D. 1518.} should receive in his Name the Crown of the Empire from the Hands of Apostolical Legates in Germany, considering that a Journey to Rome in order to be crowned there, though it were with greater Demonstrations of the Authority of the Apostolic See, was in all other Respects rather a Ceremony than a Thing of Substance.

WITH these Projects, and with these Transactions passed off the Year 1518, the Electors not being yet come to a Resolution, which became more doubtful and difficult by the Death of Cæsar, which ^{Death and Character of Maximilian Cæsar.} happened in the Beginning of the Year 1519. He died at Lintz a Town situated on the Borders of Austria, intent, as always, on the Chace of wild Beasts, and with the same Fortune in which he had almost always lived, and which having been very kind to him in offering him vast Opportunities, I know not whether she did not shew herself equally averse in not suffering him to make Use of them, or whether he did not rather deprive himself

A. D. 1519 of what Fortune brought home to his own Door meerly by his own Inconstancy, and extravagant Conceptions, which were under no Regulation, and frequently different from the Opinions of other Men, and which in Conjunction with an immense Prodigality, and Dissipation of Money interrupted all his Successes, and lost him all his Opportunities. He was otherwise a Prince very knowing in the Art of War, secret, very laborious, merciful, bountiful, and thoroughly endowed with many excellent and ornamental Gifts and Qualifications.

France
and Spain Competitors for the Empire.

MAXIMILIAN being deceased the Kings of France and Spain began openly to aspire to the Empire, and though the Contention was between Princes of such Greatness, and concerning so important an Affair, it was however managed with Modesty, without proceeding either to contumelious Words, or Menaces of Arms, but each made the best Use of his Authority, and what other Means he had, to gain over to his Side the Electors. The King of France even condescended to discourse in a very becoming becoming Manner with the Spanish Ambassadors on that Election, in which he ^{A D. 1519.} said it was commendable that each of them should be decently solicitous to adorn himself with the Splendor of so great a Dignity, which at different Times had been in the Houses of their Ancestors; but that neither of them ought on such an Account to resume it in Prejudice to the Rights of the other, nor suffer their mutual Harmony and Benevolence for that Reason to be diminished, but rather to follow the Example, which may be sometimes observed, of two young Lovers, who, tho' they love the same Woman, and each exerts himself with all his Art and Industry to obtain her, yet never fall out between themselves and quarrel upon her Account.

THE King of Spain thought he had a ^{Reasons} just Claim to the Empire because it had ^{favouring} continued many Years in the House of ^{the King} Austria, and it had not been customary for the Electors to divert it from the Descendants of the Deceased without evident Proof of their Incapacity: There was no Authority as to come in Competition with him in that Election, and it seemed to him neither just nor probable that the Electors should think of transferring so great a Dignity, which had continued so many Ages in the German Nation, on a foreign Prince. And even supposing there should be some among them, who either corrupted by Money, or for some other Reason, might have different Intentions, yet he hoped to annoy them by seasonable Preparations of Arms, and that the other Electors would oppose them, and at least that the other Princes and free Towns of Germany would not put up with so infamous and dishonourable an Act which concerned them all, and especially when the Question was about transferring the Imperial Dignity on the Person of the King of France, and by that Means increasing the Power of a King who was an Enemy to their Nation, and from whence, they might rest themselves assured, that Dignity would never return to Germany. He thought it also no difficult Matter to perfect what had been before negotiated by

by his Grandfather, an Agreement being A. D. 1519. already settled with each of the Electors concerning the Rewards and Donatives.

ON the other Side the Desires and Hopes of the King of France were by no ing founded principally on a Belief of procuring the Votes of the Electors by a very large Sum of Money. With some of these Princes he had Attachments by Ties of an-tient Friendship and Endearments, and was incited by them to this Undertaking, and persuaded of the Facility of its Accomplishment. These Hopes, as Men are prone to believe what they desire, he nourished with Reasons rather apparent than real: For he knew that, generally speaking, the Princes of Germany thought it a Grievance that the Emperors should be very powerful, from a Jealousy that they would be tempted, either in all or in Part, to reclaim the Jurisdictions which many had usurped; and therefore he persuaded himself that they would by no means consent to the Election of the King of Spain, and so voluntarily subject themfelves to an Emperor more powerful than any one that had reigned ſince the Times of the antient Emperors; whereas the Caſe was quite otherwiſe with reſpect to himſelf, for as he had no States nor antient Dependencies in Germany, they had no ſuch Occaſion to be jealous of his Greatneſs. The ſame Reason he imagined as ſufficient with the Free Towns, not only to counterballance but to explode the Concern for the Glory of the Nation, ſince Men in general are, without Compariſon, more eaſily moved by the Spurs of private Intereſt than by a Regard to the public Good. He knew that many illuſtrious Houſes in Germany, who pretended to be capable of the Imperial Dignity, were highly diſſatisfied at the Continuation of the Empire ſo many Years in the ſame Family, and that ſo eminent a Degree of Honour, which ought ſometimes to be beſtowed on one Houſe, ſometimes on another by Election, had begun in a manner by Succeſſion to perpetuate itſelf in one and the ſame Race, ſince an Election, which orders not to depart from the next in the Line of the deceased Emperors,

had the Empire passed from Albert of ^{1519.} Austria to Frederic his Brother, and from Frederic to his Son Maximilian, and now there was a Design to transmit it from Maximilian on the Person of Charles his Grandson. This Discontent and Indignation of the German Princes gave the King of France some Hopes that the Discords and Emulations between themselves might assist his Cause, it often happening in Contentions that he who sees himself, or the Party whom he favoureth excluded, precipitates himself, postponing all other Regards, into the Choice of a Third rather than give Place to him who had opposed his Intentions. Francis had also some Hopes in the Favour of the Pontiff, as well on account of the close Union and Friendship which he seemed to have contracted with him, as because he imagined that the Pope could not be pleased that Charles, a Prince of such Power, and who, by the Bordering of the Kingdom of Naples on the State of the Church, with the Adherence of the Ghibelline Party, had opened a Passage to the Gates of Rome,

A. D. Rome, should obtain also the Crown of 1519. the Empire, not considering that this Reason, which was very forcible against Charles, was of Weight also against himself. For the Pope and every other Power had as much Reason to dread the Investiture of the Empire in him as in Charles, considering that if one of them possessed perhaps more Kingdoms and States, the other was no less to be valued because his Power was not dispersed, nor divided into different Places, but his Kingdom was all contiguous and united together, the People wonderfully obedient, and the Land abounding with Riches, but not knowing in himself what he easily considered in others, he had recourse to the Pope, beseeching him that he would be pleased to grant him his Favour, since he and his Kingdoms were as much at his Devotion as if he were his own Son.

THE Pope found himself very much embarrassed with the Cause of this Election, the Assumption of either of the Kings to the Empire being highly disagreeable to him on account of the Security of the Apostolic

Apostolic See, and of the rest of Italy; A. D. 1519. and as he had no great Dependence on his } Authority with the Electors, he judged it necessary in so momentous an Affair to proceed with Prudence and artful Means.

He was persuaded that the King of France was deceived by some of the Electors, and had no Share in that Election; and that the Power of Corruption, tho' in venal Men, had not prevailed to such a Height as vilely to transfer the Empire of the German Nation to the King of France.

He imagined that it would be very easy for the King of Spain to compass his Design, because he was of the same Nation, and through the Negotiations that were begun by Maximilian, and on many other Accounts, if he did not make a very powerful Opposition against him; and this was no other Way to be effected, as he thought, than by disposing the King of France to employ the same good Offices and Money in behalf of one of the Electors which he used for procuring his own Election. He thought it impossible to induce the King to make this Step while he was at the Height of his vain Hopes, but was inclined inclined to believe that the more ardently and with the greater Expectations he involved himself in this Negotiation, the more easily, when he should come to perceive that his Projects would prove abortive, finding himself exposed, provoked, and in the Height of the Contention, he would precipitate himself into Measures for electing a third Person, whose Interest he would espouse with no less Ardor than he had shewn in prosecuting his own Cause; and he was in Hopes at this Time, that as soon as he had persuaded the King to believe that he favoured his Design, and concurred with him in his Wishes, he should find him tractable and attentive to his Authority and Counsel. It might possibly also happen, that by briskly espousing in the Beginning the Cause of the King of France, the other King, seeing such Difficulties like to attend the Prosecution of his Designs, and suspecting that the King his Adversary had a Hand in them, might in like manner be eagerly solicitous for chusing a Third. With this View he not only pretended to the King of France that he was highly desirous that the Empire ^{A. D.} should be transferred to him, but encour- ¹⁵¹⁹ aged him by many Arguments to proceed resolutely in his Design, promising in a most ample Manner to favour him with all the Authority of the Pontificate. And imagining that he could employ no better Instrument to impress on the King a Belief of the Sincerity of his Intentions in this Transaction than a Person whom his Majesty thought more dependent on himself than on others, he immediately appointed Roberto Orsino, Archbishop of Reggio, a Person in whom the King could confide, his Nuncio in Germany, with Instructions that he should both separately, and in conjunction with the French Agents, use his utmost Endeavours with the Electors for promoting his Majesty's Intentions, directing him however to proceed with more or less Moderation according to the Disposition of the Electors, and the State of Affairs in Germany. This Scheme was prudently concerted by the Pontiff, and covered with the deepest Dissimulation, but in order to make it succeed there wanted more Prudence in

 and Faithfulness in the Ministers of the French Fleet puts to Sea. BUT while these Affairs were under Transaction by Negotiation and by Arms, the King of France ordered Pietro Na- varra to put to Sea with a Fleet of Gallies and other Ships, having on board Four Thousand regular Troops, under a Pretence of cruising on the Vessels of the Moors, who having now for many Years roved about our Seas without Disturbance, infested them this Year more than ever, and to make some Attack, if the Pope pleased, on the African Coast. But the principal Motive to this Expedition was from the Apprehensions of the Pontiff, who having declared himself wholly on the French Side in the Cause of the Empire, had Reason to be afraid of the Forces of the Catholic King, who, more for Fear of being attacked than from a Desire to attack others, was with great Diligence fitting out a Squadron to be sent to guard the Kingdom of Naples.

Under

Under these mutual Distrusts and Jealousies the two Kings however continued in the same Diffimulation of mutual Friendship, and the Grand Master of France and M. de Cheures, who were intrusted in a manner with all the Counsels, and knew the Minds of their respective Kings, held a Congress by their Commission at Montpellier, for debating on the Confirmation of the Marriage of the second Daughter of the King of France with the King of Spain, and much more for settling the Affair of Navarre, the Restitution of which Kingdom to its former Sovereign had been promised by the Convention made at Noyon, and, tho' earnestly solicited by the King of France, had hitherto been delayed by the Catholic King under various Pretences. But the Death of the Grand Master happening before the Conferences began, defeated all Expectations from that Meeting.

AT this Time died Lorenzo de' Medici Death of Lorenzo de' Medici, of a Disorder under which he had languished almost ever since his Return from France, where he consummated his in-

AFTER the Death of Lorenzo the Pope being desirous to keep, while he lived, the Power of the Florentines united with that of the Church, rejecting the Counsels of some who advised him, since there remained no more but himself of the legitimate Descendents by the male Line of Cosmo de' Medici the Founder of that Greatness, to restore his Country to its Liberty, preferred the Cardinal de' Medici to the Administration of that State, either from a Desire to perpetuate the Name of his Family, or out of Hatred to the Name of a Republic because of his Exile. And judging that, on account of the Love of the People to their antient Duke, it would be difficult to keep Possession of the Dutchy of Urbino, under the Name of the only remaining Daughter of Lorenzo comprehended in her Father's Investiture, he restored it, together with Pesaro and Sinigaglia, to the Apostolic See. Nor thinking this sufficient to restrain the Arcipal Places of that Dutchy to be demolished, except those of Agobbio, to which City, because it was not so cordially affected to Francesco Maria on account of its Emulation of the City of Urbino, he shewed Favour, and increased its Reputation, appointing it the Capital of that Dutchy: And the more to weaken that State he gave the Fortrefs of San Leo, with the whole Montefeltro and the Piviero di Sestina, usually reckoned in the Territory of Cesena, to the Florentines, in Payment of Money they had disbursed for him in the War of Urbino, for which the Apostolic Chamber, by his Procurement, before stood bound, the Florentines not being well pleased with that Satisfaction, tho' unable to resist his Will.

THE Contention for the Empire, which held all Christendom in vast Suspense, was still prosecuted by both Kings with King of greater Warmth than ever, in which the France King of France was every Day more and strives to more deluded by hearkening to the mighty be Em- peror.

A. D. 1519. Promises of the Marquis of Brandenburg, one of the Electors, who having received from him very large Offers of Money, and perhaps a Sum in Hand, had not only obliged himself by some secret Articles to give him his Vote, but promised that the Archbishop of Mentz, his Brother, one of the three Electoral Prelates, should do the same. The King also promised himself much from some others of the Electors, and was in Hopes, if the Votes should be equal, of the Vote of the King of Bohemia, by which, when the six Electors, three of whom are Prelates, and three Princes, disagree with an Equality on each Side, the Controversy is decided. Wherefore he ordered the Admiral, who had before been dispatched into Germany on these Affairs, a very large Sum of Money to be distributed among the Electors; and being informed that many of the Free Towns, in conjunction with the Duke of Wirtemberg, had assembled many Troops, and threatened such as would transfer the Empire to Foreigners, he made further Provisions of Money for opposing with Arms all those who would prevent prevent the Electors from chusing him ^{A. D.} Emperor. But the States and People of ^{1519.} Germany were very sollicitous that the Imperial Dignity might not be removed from that Nation, and even the Swiss, inspired with the Love of the common Country Germany, had supplicated the Pontiff to use his Interest for none in that Election who should not be of the German Language. He continued however to favour the King of France, in Hopes that by shewing himself so zealous for his Cause, he would be induced to give the greater Credit to his Counsel, by which at last he endeavoured to persuade him to lay aside all Hopes of being elected himself, and to continue the same Efforts for procuring the Election of any other of the German Princes. But his Advice took no Effect, for the Admiral and Roberto Orsino, deceived by those who, to draw Money from the French, gave them most certain Assurances, and possessed with Passion, one by being of the French Temper, and a Minister of the Court, and the other from his easy Disposition, and a Desire of acquiring the royal Fa-

SUCH were the Negotiations when those to whom belongs the Power of electing the Roman Emperor, not by the more antient Custom, or well grounded Reason, but by the Concession of the Roman Pontiff Gregory V. a German by Nation, assembled themselves, according to antient Custom, at Francfort, a Town of lower Germany. While they employed themselves in various Debates on the due Time for proceeding to the Election according to their Statutes, an Army, set on Foot by Order of the King of Spain, who was more ready to raise Soldiers with his Money than to give it away to the Electors, advancing within the Neighbourhood of Francfort, under Pretence of preventing all Attempts for procuring an Election by violent Means, increased the Courage of those Electors who favoured his Cause, drew those who were dubious over to the same Side, and so intimidated Brandenburg, who was inclined to the King of France,

France, that despairing of the Concurrence ^{A. D.} of the other Electors in his Designs, and ^{1519.} willing to avoid the Hatred and Reproach of the whole Nation, he had not the Assurance to discover his Intentions. On proceeding therefore to the Act of Election, on the twenty-eighth Day of June, Charles of Austria, King of Spain, was elected <sup>Charles

Nor was it doubted that if, by the Equality of Votes, the Election had come to the Disposal of the seventh Elector, the Event would have been the same; for Lewis King of Bohemia, who was also King of Hungary, had promised his Vote to Charles.

THIS Election was a great Mortification to the King of France, and to his Dependents in Italy, and on the other Hand greatly animated those who had contrary

A. D. 1519. Hopes or Designs, seeing such great Power vested in one Prince alone, young in Years, and one to whom, it was believed, had by many Prophecies been promised a large Empire with wonderful Felicity. And tho' he did not abound in Money as much as the King of France, yet he enjoyed one Advantage of very great Importance, in that he could fill up his Armies with German and Spanish Infantry, highly esteemed for their Valour and Bravery, in which Respect it was quite otherwise with the King of France, for as he had no Foot in his own Kingdom that were capable of resisting the others, he could not engage in any considerable Wars without hiring Infantry from foreign Countries with very great Expence, and sometimes with very considerable Difficulty. In this Exigence he was obliged to entertain in his Service with great Care and Cost the Swiss, and to bear with many Injuries from them, and yet he was never secure of their Constancy, nor of their Faithfulness. Nor was it doubted but that between two young Princes, who had many Causes of Emulation, and of Contention, the

the Scene would at last end in a very dangerous and destructive War ; for the King of France retained his Desire of recovering the Kingdom of Naples, pretending a just Title to it, and he had at Heart the Reinstating of King John in the Kingdom of Navarre, with the Hopes of which he was now sensible that he had been vainly amused. Cæsar was uneasy at the Payment of the One Hundred Thousand Ducats, to which he was obliged by the Convention at Noyon, and it appeared to him that the King, by rejecting the Accommodation before made at Paris, and making an immoderate Use of the Opportunity of his being necessitated to pass into Spain, had in a manner constrained him by Force to come to a new Agreement. The Cause of the Duke of Guelderland always presented itself fresh before them, which alone, on account of his being in the Protection of the King, and reputed a great Enemy by the State of Flanders, was enough to excite them to Arms. But what above all stirred up the keenest Resentment in the Breast of the new Cæsar was the Dutchy of Burgundy, which

A. D. being seized by Lewis XI. on occasion of 1519. the Death of Charles Duke of Burgundy, maternal Grandfather to Cæsar's Father, had always disquieted the Minds of that Duke's Successors. Nor were there wanting Incentives or Cause of Contention on account of the Dutchy of Milan, of which the present King, not having, since the Death of Lewis XII. obtained nor demanded the Investiture, and many Exceptions being pretended to the Rights he had acquired by the Investiture made to his Predecessor, both from the Invalidity and Diminution of those Rights, even this was sufficient to raise a War between them. But neither Times nor Opportunities would at present permit them to make any Movement, for besides that it was necessary for Cæsar to repass first into Germany to receive, according to the Custom of Emperors elect, the Crown of the Empire at Aix, it must be considered, that either of them was so powerful that the Difficulty of injuring one the other restrained each from being the Aggressor before he had perfectly informed himself of the Dispositions and Inclinations of the other

other Princes, and particularly, if a War ^{A. D.} was to be made in Italy, of the Pope. ^{1519.} But the Mind of the Pontiff, which he took care to conceal by his usual Arts of Dissimulation, was unknown to all, and perhaps sometimes unresolved in itself. He had however, more because he had no Pretence to refuse it without grievous Offence than out of free Will, dispensed with Charles's Acceptation of his Election to the Empire contrary to the Tenor of the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, in which, according to the Form of the antient Investitures, it was expressly forbidden him.

THUS Italy for these Reasons preserved itself in Peace, tho' at the End of this ^{Pope forms a} same Year the Pontiff made an Attempt ^{Plot against} to get Possession of the City of Ferrara, ^{Ferrara.} not by open Arms but by secret Conspiracy. For tho' it was believed that, by the Death of his Nephew Lorenzo, wanting Men more than States in his Family, he had laid aside all Thoughts of the Acquisition of Ferrara, to which he had before always aspired, yet, either stimulated by his his antient Hatred conceived against that Duke, or by an ambitious Desire of equalling, or at least approaching as near as he could, the Glory of Julius, the Death of his Brother and Nephew had not in any measure allayed the Ardor of those Passions. Hence it may easily be comprehended that the Ambition of Priests has no greater Incentives than from itself; since neither the Condition of the Times, nor the Situation and Strength of that City, which Alfonso had with the greatest Diligence put in a very good State of Defence, would allow him to think of taking it by open Force; especially as it was also provided with almost an infinite Quantity of very fine Cannon and military Stores, and the Duke, by limiting his Expences in every Article, and imposing new Duties and Customs, having improved his Revenue to the uttermost, and by his industrious Management representing on many Accounts rather a Merchant than a Prince, was believed to have accumulated a vast Stock of Money. The Pontiff therefore had no Hopes, without an Alteration in the Circumstances of the Times,

Times, of obtaining his Desire any other A. D.
Way than by secret Plotting and Con- 1519. spiracy, which Method he had for the Time past in vain pursued by tampering with Niccolo da Este and many others.
And Alfonso not knowing that he still practised these treacherous Arts, but thinking himself in a manner secure, not of his Will but of his Plots, the Pontiff, considering the Means that were proposed to him, that Alfonso was by a slow Disorder reduced to so weak a Condition that his Recovery seemed almost desperate, and that his Brother the Cardinal, because he was in Disgrace at the Court of Rome, resided in Hungary, thought it a fit Season to attempt the Execution of a Design which had been proposed to him by some Exiles of Ferrara, in concert with Alessandro Fregoso Bishop of Ventimiglia, who then lived in Bologna, because he had aspired to be Doge as his Father the Cardinal had been, and was therefore obnoxious to Ottaviano Fregoso. This Prelate had met with bad Success in the Plots which he had formed for procuring his Return to his own Country, but promised himself

A. D. 1519. himself better Fortune in that which he managed for others in foreign Countries.

THE Bishop then, under Colour of making an Attempt to enter by Force of Arms into Genoa, privately received of the Pontiff Ten Thousand Ducats, with which he listd Two Thousand Foot in the Territory of Rome, and in the Luni-giana. On the Report of this Levy Ottaviano Fregoso, sollicitous for his own Safety, put himself in a State of Defence by Sea and Land; the Bishop then, making a Show as if by the Discovery of his Designs he was cut off from all Hopes of effecting at present a Change in the State of Genoa, gave Notice to Federigo da Bozzolo, by whose Assistance, in a great measure, Concordia was maintained against Giovanni Francesco Count of Mirandola, that he might serve himself with those Troops while their Pay lasted, which was near a Month, and passing the Appennine, descended into the Territory of Correggio, marching slowly along the Road of Concordia. The Execution of the Plot depended on passing the River Po, for which sign, had hired, under the Name of Dealers in Corn, a good Number of Boats which lay at the Mouth of the River Secchia, as the Inhabitants of the circumjacent Territory call the Place where the Secchia falls into the Po. As soon as the Troops had passed the Po the Bishop designed to advance with utmost Speed to Ferrara, where he had been a few Months before, and had observed a Place of the Town on the Po, where above Forty Braces of the Wall were fallen down, and made a wide and open Breach, very easy to enter. This Part of the Wall had tumbled down not long before, and was not so quickly repaired because the Nearness of the River, and Security of the Inhabitants gave too much Occasion to the Negligence of those whose Office it was carefully to provide against such Accidents.

 But as soon as a Report was spread through the circumjacent Country that Ventimiglia with these Troops had passed the Appennine, the Marquis of Mantoua, not out of any particular Jealousy, but from an old Custom

A. D.

1519.

Custom of rendering the Passage of Rivers difficult to foreign Troops, had removed all the Boats in the Mouth of the Secchia, so that Ventimiglia was not able to serve himself of the hired Boats, and had no Conveniency of speedily providing others, chiefly because the neighbouring Governors of the Church had not been advised of the Project, nor had any Commission, if they had known it, to interfere in it. While therefore the Bishop and the People of Alberto were seeking out some Remedy for this Inconvenience, he lay with the Troops about Correggio, and in the neighbouring Places, where having talked too freely in public, and indiscreetly discovered to some particular Persons all the Circumstances of his Design, the Thing took Air, and came to the Ears of the Marquis of Mantoua, and he, by one of his People, notified it to the Duke of Ferrara, who was so far from suspecting such a Design, that he could hardly be persuaded to believe it. Moved however more by the probable Evidence of the broken Wall than by any other Circumstance of the Story, he set

set about raising Troops; and pretending ^{A. D.} that he had no Suspicion of the Pope, ^{1519.} tho' in his Heart he thought otherwise, he informed him of the Plot that had been laid against him by the Bishop of Ventimiglia, and beseeched him to send his Orders to the neighbouring Governors to assist him if Necessity required. The Pope readily granted his Request by favourable Briefs, but at the same time privately transmitted different Orders. The Report of the Preparations that were making at Ferrara, joined to the Difficulty of passing the Po, extinguished the Hopes of the Bishop of Ventimiglia; wherefore he remained with his Troops near Concordia, and while he was carrying on a Treaty with the People of that Place, who already suspected him, about acting against Mirandola, he suddenly one Night presented himself before the Walls of Concordia, and gave an Assault, but with a Design to make the World believe that his Coming into these Places was not with an Intent to proceed to Ferrara, but to seize on Concordia. This Attack proved unsuccessful, and the Troops had afterwards his Leave to break up and dispose of themselves. Many however were of Opinion, and Alfonso himself, that if the Bishop had not been deprived of the Means for passing the Po, he would have made his Way through the broken Wall into Ferrara, where was no Garrison, nor Suspicions of any Danger, the Duke in a very bad State of Health, and the People so dissatisfied with his Administration, that very few, on the rising of a sudden Tumult, would have taken Arms, or hazarded their Lives for the State.

WE are now entering upon the Year 1520. in which, the Peace of Italy being continued from the same Causes by which it had been preserved the Year preceding, new upstart Doctrines began to spread mightily, first against the Authority of the Roman Church, and afterwards against the Authority of the Christian Religion. This pestiferous Poison had its Original in Germany, in the Province of Saxony, by the Preachings of Martin Luther, a professed Friar of the Order of St. Austin, who begun for the most part with reviving the old

Rise of the
Heresy.

old Errors of the Bobemians, which being A. D. 1520. condemned by the General Council of the Church held at Constance, and John Hus and Jerome of Prague, two of the principal Heads of that Herefy, burnt by the Authority of that Council, had been for a long Time restrained within the Confines of Bobemia. The Occasion of their Revival in Germany was a too licentious Use of the Authority of the Apostolic See by Leo, who, in regard to the Favours which that Court dispenses in spiritual and beneficial Matters, following the Advice of Lorenzo Pucci, Cardinal of Santi Quattro, had dispersed over all the World, without Distinction of Times and Places, most ample Indulgences, of Virtue sufficient not only for the Relief of Mortals in this present Life, but to deliver the Souls of the Deceased from the Pains of Purgatory. And because it was notorious that these Indulgences were granted for extorting Money from People, and were imprudently exercised by the Commissaries deputed to that Exaction, most of whom had purchased of the Court the Licence to exercise that Office, he had excited much Indignation, and given great Offence in many Places, and especially in Germany, where the Power of delivering the Souls of the Dead out of Purgatory was seen to be sold by his Officers for a small Price, or play'd away at Gaming in Taverns. And the Scandal was increased when it was known that the Pope, who, from the Easiness of his Temper, discharged the pontifical Office in many Cases with little Majesty, had made a Present to his Sister Maddalena of the Profits arising from the Sale of Indulgences in many Parts of Germany: And she having appointed as her Commissary Bishop Aremboddo, a Minister worthy of that Commission, which he exercised with great Avarice and Extortion; and it being known over all Germany that the Money squeezed from them was never paid in to the Pope or the Apostolical Chamber, whence perhaps some Part of it might possibly be applied to good Uses, but was all designed to satisfy the Avarice of one Woman, he had rendered detestable not only the Exaction and the Officers employ'd in it, but the Name and Authority

A. D.

to grant it. 1525.

LUTHER, having taken this Opportunity, and begun to despise those Concessions, and to question the Authority of the Pope in them, the great Number of his Auditors in a Cause so plausible, and grateful to the Ears of the People, still increasing, began every Day more openly to deny the Authority of the Pontiff. From these Beginnings, perhaps honest, or at least, from the just Occasion that was given him, in some measure excusable, being transported with Ambition, popular Applause, and the Favour of the Duke of Saxony, he not only inveighed too immoderately against the Power of the Pontiffs, and the Authority of the Roman Church, but also, running into the Errors of the Bohemians, began in Process of Time to remove Images out of the Churches, to strip Ecclesiastical Places of their Ornaments, to allow Marriage to professed Monks and Nuns, and to justify such a Practice not only by Authority and Arguments, but also by his own Example,

A. D. 1520. to deny that the Pope had any Power without the Bishopric of Rome, or any more Authority in his Diocese than what belongs to every other Bishop within his Precincts, to reject all Determinations of Councils, all the Writings of those called the Doctors of the Church, all the Canon Laws, and Decrees of the Popes, referring himself wholly to the Old Testament, the Book of the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, to whatever is comprehended under the Name of the New Testament, and to the Epistles of St. Paul, but giving to them all new and doubtful Senses, and Interpretations never known before. Nor did the Madness of him and of his Followers rest within these Bounds, but followed, as it may be said, by almost all Germany, running daily into more detestable and pernicious Errors, proceeded so far as to strike at the Sacraments of the Church, and to despise Fastings, Penances and Confessions; some of his Followers afterwards, tho' become in some measure Dissenters from his Authority, giving themselves the Liberty to invent pestiferous and diabolical Opinions

concerning the Eucharist. These Impieties, which all owe their Rise to a ^{A D.} Rejection of the Authority of the Councils and of the Holy Doctors, have made Way for every new and perverse Invention and Interpretation, and have spread themselves into many Parts even without the Bounds of Germany, because they contain a Kind of Doctrine which setting Men free from a Multitude of Precepts enjoined for the universal Good by the General Councils of the Church, the Decrees of the Popes, the Authority of the Canons, and the sound Interpretations of the holy Doctors, leaves them at Liberty to live according to their own Discretion, and, as it were, without Restraint.

THE Pontiff used his Endeavours to suppress this pestiferous Doctrine in its ^{Progress} Beginnings, but did not use the Remedies ^{of Lutheranism.} and Methods proper for the Cure of so great a Disorder; for he cited Martin Luther to Rome, suspended him from the Office of Preaching, and afterwards for his Disobedience subjected him to the

A. D. 1520. Ecclesiastic Censures, but did not refrain from shewing very bad Examples in many Things, which were deservedly condemned by Luther, and gave Offence to all People; whence the Prosecution by Ecclesiastic Arms was so far from diminishing that it increased the Reputation of Martin with the Public, as if he were fallen under Persecution more for the Innocency of his Life, and the Soundness of his Doctrine, than for any other Cause. The Pope sent many in religious Orders to preach in Germany against him, and wrote many Briefs to Princes and to Prelates; but neither this nor many other Means that were used being sufficient to repress him, because of the Inclination of the People, and the great Favour shown him in the Towns of the Duke of Saxony, the Cause began to appear every Day more and more interesting in the Court of Rome, and increased the Apprehensions that it would prove vastly detrimental to the Grandeur of the Popes, to the Profits of the Roman Court, and to the Unity of the Christian Religion. Wherefore frequent Consistories were held this Year in

Rome on that Occasion, and frequent Consultations of Cardinals and Divines appointed for that Purpose in the Pope's Chamber, in order to find out Remedies for this Disorder, which still grew worse. And tho' there were not wanting some to admonish that the Prosecution of Luther had hitherto only served to increase his Reputation and Favour with the People, because it was not attended with a Correction of many Things worthy of Reproof in themselves, and that it would have been a less Evil to dissemble the Sense of that Disgrace, which would perhaps have wore away of itself, than by blowing the Coals to kindle a Contention and increase its Rage, yet, as it is the Nature of Men to proceed rather by violent Remedies, not only the Prosecutions were carried on with greater Vigour against Martin and those others his Followers, commonly called Lutherans, but it was resolved to issue a very severe Monitory against the Duke of Saxony, by which being exasperated he became the more vehement Defender of his Cause, which for many Years together has been propagated pagated to that Degree that almost all Christendom is in great Danger to be infected with the Contagion. Nor has any thing so much checked its Course as the Knowledge that the Followers of this Doctrine are no less obnoxious to the Power of temporal Princes than to the Authority of the Roman Pontiffs, which has been the Cause that many Princes have for their own Interest carefully prohibited under severe Penalties the Admittance of this Contagion into their Dominions. On the contrary nothing has so much confirmed the Stubbornness of these Errors, which have sometimes, by the Extravagances of the Heads of those Heresies, and by the Variety and even Contrariety of Opinions among themselves, been ready to fall into Confusion and sink away, as the licentious Liberty acquired by the People in their Way of Living, and the Avarice of Potentates, which will not suffer them to deprive themselves of the Goods and Estates which they have ravished from the Churches.

NOTHING

NOTHING more happened this Year worthy of Memory, except that Gian Pagolo expelled Gentile, of the same Family of the Baglioni, and his Partner in the Administration, out of Perugia, either on account of some Quarrel arising between them, or because Gian Pagolo, not contenting himself with the greater Share and Authority in the Government, was willing to engross the whole Management: The Pope, displeased at this Violence, caused Gian Pagolo to be cited to make his personal Appearance at Rome; but Pagolo, afraid to go thither himself, sent his Son Malatesta to make his Justification, with Offers of his ready Obedience to all the Pope's Commands. But the Pontiff insisting on his Coming, after he had been many Days in Perplexity, he resolved to go, partly from a Confidence in antient Merits, and Services done to his Family on all Occasions, and partly through the Persuasions of Camillo Orsino his Son-in-law, and others of his Friends, who employing their Authority, and making Use of powerful Means with the Pontiff, either obtained

A. D. 1520. obtained of him an exprefs Promise, tho' not in Writing, or at least the Pontiff abused their Credulity with the most crafty and ensnaring Speeches, and so well disguised his Intentions, that those who were confident that they could sound him, and know his Mind, encouraged Baglione to make his Appearance, assuring him that he might do it with Safety. But when he was arrived at Rome, he found that the Pope, under Pretence of taking his Diversion, as it was usual with him at other Times, was a few Days before retired into the Castle of Sant' Angelo; and the next Morning Gian Pagolo going to present himself, was, before he came to the Pope's Presence, arrested by the Governor, and being afterwards rigorously examined by Judges appointed for that Purpose confessed many enormous Crimes both in the Measures he had taken for supporting himself in the Tyranny, and for indulging his brutal Pleasures, or otherwise serving his private Interest, for which he was, after above two Months Imprisonment, according to the Course of Justice, beheaded. It was thought that the

 vinced by many Signs that Gian Pagolo was disaffected towards him, and held Correspondence with Francesco Maria, and that he could have no firm Dependence upon him in all Emergencies, nor consequently be secure of Perugia while he was at the Head of that State. To settle therefore the Administration of Affairs in that City on such an Establishment as should best answer his Purpose, the Sons of Gian Pagolo, on the News of their Father's Imprisonment, having fled, he constituted Silvio Cardinal of Cortona, his old Servant and Pupil, his Legate for that Intent, and restored Gentile to Perugia, bestowing on him the Goods that were in the Possession of Gian Pagolo, and placing him in the highest Seat of Honour and Greatness, but he rested his Affairs on a very weak Foundation.

THE Pontiff this Year continued to try new Plots on the Duke of Ferrara, duct, or to some other Cause. For this Purpose he employed Uberto da Gambera, Apostolical Protonotary, to treat with one Rodolph, a German, and Captain of some German Foot in Alfonso's Guards, who had promised to give him free Entrance at Pleasure by the Gate of Castello Tialto. The Way lying open for any Troops that might be sent from Bologna and Modena, who had no Occasion to pass the Po but only by a wooden Bridge that is before the Gate, Orders were given to Guido Rangone and the Governor of Modena to assemble some Troops on other Pretences, and to march on a sudden and take Possession of that Gate, in which they were to defend themselves till they were joined by some Forces from Modena and Bologna, where Dispositions were made for the Troops to move with all pressing Haste without Form or Order. But the Day being appointed for making the Attack, it was discovered that Rodolph, who had, by the Pope's Orders, received of Uberto da Gambera about Two Thousand Ducats, had from the very Beginning acquainted Alfonso with every Particular of the Plot; and the Duke

 Pope's Mind, and of his Designs, not willing to push the Affair any farther, took care to publish the fraudulent Trick of Rodolph.

IN this same Year Cæsar passed by Sea from Spain to Flanders, having in his Passage, not from Necessity, as his Father had done, but of his own Accord, touch'd on the Coast of England, for the Sake of conferring with that King, with whom he remained in good Understanding. From Flanders he went into Germany, and received in October at Aix-la-Chapelle, a City very same, as it is reported, with which Charles the Great was crowned, which was set on his Head, according to antient Custom, by the Authority of the Princes of Germany.

BUT this Felicity of Charles was disturbed by new Troubles arising in Spain; Insurrection in Spain. for the People of these Kingdoms had

A. D. 1520. been uneasy at his Promotion to the Empire, because they knew it would be necessary for him, on various Accounts, to spend no small Part of his Time out of Spain, to the very great Inconvenience and Detriment of them all. But they had much greater Motives from the immoderate Hatred which they had conceived against the Avarice of those who were in the Administration, especially against Cheures, who with insatiable Greediness had by all manner of Ways accumulated a vast Sum of Money. And the same Measures had been taken by the other Flemings in selling at a Price to Foreigners those Places which were wont to be bestowed on Spaniards, and rendering venal all Graces, Privileges and Expeditions, for which Petitions were preferred at Court. Hence all the People being incensed against the Name of the Flemings, the Inhabitants of Valadolid had been tumultuous at the Departure of Cæsar, and he was hardly gone out of Spain, when all the People made an Insurrection, not, as they said, against the King, but against wicked Governors, and communicating Counsels together paid no

no longer Obedience to the King's Commissioners, but had assembled the greater ^{A. D. 1520.} Part of the People, who settled a Form of Government, which was exercised in the Name of the Holy Junto, a Title they bestowed on the General Council of the People. The Generals and Ministers of the King took up Arms against the Seditious, and an open War was commenced, and Disorders grew to so great a Head; that Cæsar had very little Authority left; which Circumstance of his Affairs increased the Hopes of those in Italy and elsewhere who had Reason to desire a Diminution of so formidable a Greatness.

CÆSAR'S Fleet had however been successful against the Moors, and taken from them the Island of Gerbe; and in Germany the Influence of the King of France was in some measure restrained. For the King ^{Duke of Wirtemberg driven out of his State.} favouring the Duke of Wirtemberg, who was at Variance with the Swabian League, with a View to foment Divisions in that Province, the People so highly resented it that they drove the Duke out of his State, and sold it as acquired by Conquest to Cæsar, who was desirous to

A. D. humble the Adherents of the King of France, and obliged themselves to defend him in the Possession of it against all who should offer to molest him. The Duke therefore seeing himself ruined by his Reliance on France, had no other Way left than to have Recourse to the Clemency of Cæsar, and accept such Terms as he should be pleased to grant him, and yet was not, on account of this Submission, reinstated in the Possession of his Dutchy.

At the End of this Year about Three Thousand Spanish Foot, who had been several Months in Sicily, not chusing to return to Spain according to the Orders they had received from Cæsar, and despising the Authority of their Officers, crossed over to Reggio in Calabria; then proceeding, with vast Damage over all the Country in their March, towards the State of the Church, excited terrible Apprehensions in the Pope, who had fixed in his Memory the troublesome Affair of Urbino, and feared lest, either at the Instigation of other Princes, or attended by Duke Francesco Maria, or the Sons of Gian Pagolo Baglione, and some other Enemies of the Church, they would raise some some Combustion, especially since they refused the Offers made them by the Vice-roy of Naples, and by himself, to take Part of them into Pay; and bestow a Donative of Money on the rest. Assuming greater Spirits from these Offers they put themselves in Motion towards the River Tronto, not through the close Country of the Capitanato, but through the wide Road of Puglia; and being continually reinforced with other Foot, and some Horse, they became more and more formidable. A Stop was however put to this Movement with more Ease and Quickness than had been imagined. For these Troops having passed the Tronto in order to advance into the Marca Anconitana, whither the Pope had sent good Numbers of Soldiers, and laying Siege to Ripa Transona, they were after a vigorous Assault, in which they lost many of their Men, constrained to retire. This unsuccessful Attempt so greatly diminished their Courage and Reputation; that they were glad to accept from the Agents of Cæsar Conditions far less to their Advantage than those which they had before rejected.

 than from the Appearance of any probable Reasons of Fear, the Affairs of Italy, a few Months after, began to be embroiled by much longer, greater, and more dangerous Wars than those that were past, the Ambition of two very potent Kings, full of mutual Emulation, Hatred and Jealousy, stimulating them to exercise all their Power, and discharge all their Wrath in Italy.
 That unhappy Country having enjoyed three Years Peace, though dubious, and full of Jealousies, it now seemed as if Heaven, its own Fate, and Fortune, were either envious of its Tranquillity, or were apprehensive that the Continuation of its

 Cause of the War
 in Italy.

THE Beginning to new Commotions was given by those very Persons who, being more than others obliged to procure the Preservation of Peace, are more frequently than others the Disturbers of it, and kindle with all their Industry and Authority a Combustion which, if no other Remedy be sufficient, they ought to extinguish with their own Blood. For tho' the Disaffection between Cæsar and the King of France increased continually, yet they had no very urgent Reasons at present for a War; neither did they so much exceed one the other in Power in Italy, or in any Opportunity, as to be able to injure one another without the Assistance of some others of the Italian Princes; because the King of France, having the Venetians in Confederacy with him for the Defence of the State of Milan, and the Swiss no longer caring to make Wars in their own Name, but only disposed to serve for Hire any one who would pay them, had no Reason to be apprehensive of any Movement ment of Cæsar, either by Way of the Kingdom of Naples, or from Germany. A. D. 1521.

Neither on the other hand was it easy for the King of France to injure Cæsar in the Kingdom of Naples without the Concurrence of the Pope in such an Enterprize. Each of the Princes also was sollicitous to procure the Friendship of the Pope, by various Arts and Offers, to such a Degree as to make it believed that if his Holiness had continued to stand neuter between them, and had been vigilant, and careful to employ the Pontifical Authority, and the Credit which a just Neutrality would have procured him, for tempering Heats and Animosities, and repressing the Ardor of turbulent Counsels in their Origin, the Peace must have been preserved. Nor was there any apparent Cause that could necessitate him to desire or excite a War, for he had before met with ill Success in his martial Undertakings, and both these Princes were so great that he had equal Reason to dread the Victory of either, clearly knowing that nothing could hinder or restrain the Conqueror from bringing all Italy under his Subjection. He held in quiet Possession, and in perfect Submission, the very large State of the Church, and all his Court were flourishing and happy in the highest Degree ; he had full Authority over the State of Florence, a powerful State in those Times, and very rich ; and he himself was by Nature addicted to Idleness and Pleasures, and at that Time, by an Excess of Liberty and Greatness, averse above measure to all Business, spending whole Days with Musicians, Jesters and Buffoons, and inclined, even beyond the Bounds of Decency, to sensual Gratifications, so that he seemed to be quite taken off from all Thoughts of War. To these Considerations it was added that Leo had a Mind so full of exalted Ideas of Splendor and Magnificence, as would have been surprising if he could even have boasted his Descent in a very long Succession from the greatest Kings ; and as in his splendid Appearances, or in his Donations, he knew no Measure nor Distinction, he had not only in a short Time, with incredible Prodigality, dissipated the Treasure accumulated by Julius, but also infinite Sums, raised and many Kinds of new Offices invented on Purpose to exact Money, and was so excessive in his Expences that he was forced to be continually racking his Wits in contriving new Methods for supporting his Profuseness, which was by no means lessened, but rather increased. He had no Temptations to aggrandise any of his Kindred, and though he was tormented with a restless Desire to recover Parma and Piacenza, and acquire Ferrara, yet the Possession of these Cities did not seem a sufficient Reason for him to turn the World upside down, and subvert the public Peace, but rather to temporise in Expectation of Occasions and Opportunities. But it is a true as well as a common Saying, “ Men have no greater Enemy than too much Prosperity,” since it puts them out of their own Government, makes them licentious, and bold in doing Evil, and desirous of disturbing their own Happiness with Innovations.

Pope's Motives and Preparations for War.

LEO under these Circumstances, either thinking it a great Disgrace to have lost Parma and Piacenza, which had been so gloriously acquired by Julius; or incapable of restraining his passionate Desire of possessing Ferrara; or imagining that if he should die without performing some grand Exploit he should leave a Reproach on the Memory of his Pontificate; or doubting, as he said himself, that the two Kings finding themselves each excluded from the Hopes of his Alliance, and by that means hardly capable of injuring one another, would at last condescend to some Convention between themselves, to the Depression of the Church and of all the rest of Italy; or hoping, as I heard afterwards from the Cardinal de' Medici, the Confidant of all his Secrets, that if the French were driven out of Genoa and the Dutchy of Milan it would be easy to drive Cæsar out of the Kingdom of Naples, and so he might claim to himself that Glory of the Liberty of Italy to which his Predecessor before had manifestly aspired: An Enterprize that Leo was unable to accomplish plish with his own Forces, but was in A. D.

 Hopè, after first softening the Spirit of the 1521.
 King of France by creating some Cardinals, whom he should propose, and by shewing himself ready to grant him other Favours, to induce him to lend his Assistance against Cæsar, as if the King were to receive instead of a Recompence for his Losses the Satisfaction to see that Cæsar had met with no better Fortune than himself.
 Whatever was his Motive, whether one, or more, or all these Reasons, he turned all his Thoughts upon War, and on making an Alliance with one of these two Princes, in Conjunction with whom he might carry on a War in Italy against the other. And to prepare himself for the Execution of this Design, and that he might not in the mean time be oppressed by either while he was treating with both, though most closely with the King of France, he dispatched into Swisserland Antonio Pucci Bishop of Pistoia, who afterwards obtained, when Times were changed, the Dignity of the Cardinalship, to enlist and conduct into the State of the Church a Body of Six Thousand Swiss.

A. D. 1521. The Cantons made no Difficulty of granting this Levy on account of the Confederacy which the Pope had renewed with them after the War of Urbino, and a free Passage being obtained for them through the State of Milan they were conducted into the Dominion of the Church, and quartered for several Months in Romagna and the Marca. And every one being at a Loss to conjecture for what Purpose he put himself to such great and needless Charges, since there was no Movement in Italy, he protested that he had called them about him that he might live in Safety, knowing that the Rebels of the Church were every Day forming new Schemes. This Reason not carrying an Air of Probability, the Opinion and Talk of the Public were different on the Subject. Some believed that he had put himself in a State of Defence for fear of the King of France, others imagined that he had a Design to seize on Ferrara, and others again were of Opinion that his Intent was to drive Charles out of the Kingdom of Naples. But there was a secret Treaty on Foot between the Pope and the King of France about about attacking with joint Forces the Neapolitan Kingdom, of which the Conditions were, that Gaeta and all the Country between the River Garigliano and the Borders of the Ecclesiastic State should be an Acquisition to the Church, and the rest of the Kingdom should be appropriated to the second Son of the King of France, who, because he was under Years, was, together with the Kingdom, till he came of mature Age, to be put under the Government of an Apostolical Legate, who was to reside in Naples. Besides this it was specified in the Treaty that the King should assist the Pontiff against the Subjects and Feudatories of the Apostolic See, which was an Article that concerned the Establishment of the States possessed by the Church, and had no less Regard to the Pope's immoderate Desire of acquiring Ferrara.

 A. D. 1521.

AT this Juncture it happened very seasonably for these Purposes that the King of France, invited by the Opportunity of the Tumults in Spain, and encouraged, as he afterwards asserted in his Remonstrance,

A. D. France, by the Pope, sent an Army under the Command of Asparrot, Brother of Lautrech, into Navarre to recover that Kingdom under the Dominion of the old King, and at the same time he sent Orders to Robert de la Marche and the Duke of Guelderland to begin Hostilities on the Borders of Flanders. The Divisions in Spain paved an easy Way for Asparrot to reconquer the Kingdom of Navarre, which was destitute of Defence, and where the Memory of the former King was not obliterated; and after that General had by the Force of his Artillery made himself Master of the Castle of Pampelona, he entered the Borders of the Kingdom of Catalonia, took Possession of Fontarabia, and made Incurfions as far as *Logroña.

* Catalonia was never reckoned a Kingdom, but had only the Title of a Principality; and Fontarabia is not in Catalonia, but quite remote from it on the Western Ocean. But if for Catalonia we read Aragon, which was a Kingdom bordering on Navarre, and comprehending Catalonia, and suppose a Detachment sent to take Possession of Fontarabia, which lies in the Kingdom of Gallicia, the Sense will be clear, especially since it appears from the 11th Book that Logroña was in the Kingdom of Aragon, for which perhaps he might substitute Catalonia because it was the best Part of it.

BUT, as it often happens in human Affairs, what the Public had imagined as of Necessity prejudicial to Cæsar turned out to his Advantage. For the Affairs of Spain, which had hitherto been greatly embroiled by the various Progress of the civil Commotions, were fallen into a very turbulent and dangerous Situation, the Commonalty both high and low combining together on one side, and a great Number of Lords and People of Quality having taken up Arms in Behalf of Cæsar. The Nobility, out of a Concern for the Interest of the State, dreaded the popular Licentiousness, which hurried the Malecontents into open Rebellion, and, wanting a Head of Authority, they would have taken the Duke of Calabria out of the Castle of Sciativa; but he refused to bear Arms against Cæsar, and would not leave his Prison. But the Attack made on their own Kingdom by the King of France caused such Emotions in the Minds of the People, who had suffered without Displeasure the Loss of the Kingdom of Navarre,

A. D. though become by the Union made by the Kingdoms, that partly for this Reason, tentions, and returned under Obedience to their King.

 make an Alliance with the King of France.

THE prosperous Success of the King of France in the easy Conquest of the Kingdom of Navarre was followed, had he known how to use the Opportunity, by a happier Event. For the Swiss, with whom resided his own Ambassadors and those of Cæsar, each carefully soliciting an Alliance with their respective Masters, contrary to the Opinion of many, and to their professed Intentions, rejected the Friendship of Cæsar, and embraced an Alliance with the King of France, obliging themselves to grant him Leave to lift as many of their Men as he pleased, and for any Enterprize, and not to suffer any other Power to make Levies in their Country in order to be employed against that King.

THERE

THERE remained the Execution of the Convention made at Rome between the Pope and the King of France, but when the King was requested to ratify it, he began to demur and stand in Suspense, for many had infused into him Suspicions that considering the Double-dealing of the Pope, and the Hatred which he had continually manifested to him since his Assumption to the Pontificate, there was Room to suspect some Treachery. It was not probable, they said, that the Pope desired that the Kingdom of Naples should come to him or to his Children, because if he had that Kingdom and the Dutchy of Milan, he would be too much afraid of his Power; certain it was at least that such great Benevolence, discovered all on a sudden, had something in it mysterious. He should take Heed therefore that he did not suffer in his Affairs from Frauds, and that while he was assuring himself of acquiring the Kingdom of Naples he did not lose the State of Milan. For if he sent an Army to Naples it would be in the Power of the Pontiff, who had Six Thousand Swiss, by holding Intelligence with the Emperor's Generals, to overthrow it; and if that Army was overthrown, what Defence was there left for Milan? Nor was it to be wondered that the Pope, who had attempted to dispossess him of that Dutchy by Force, should, in Despair of obtaining his Ends by any other Means, endeavour to deprive him of it by Fraud. These Reasons made such an Impression on the King that hesitating to ratify, and perhaps expecting an Answer on some other Negotiations, he sent no Advices to Rome, but left the Pope and his own Ambassadors in Suspense.

BUT the Pontiff, either because he was in reality, though governing himself by his usual Dissimulation, averse in his Heart to the King, or because, as soon as he saw the whole Time in which he could expect an Answer expired, suspecting the Reason, he was apprehensive that the King would discover his Negotiations to Cæsar, which might lay a Foundation for a Convention between them to his Prejudice, excited also by his ardent Desire to recover
Parma

Parma and Piacenza, and to perform some memorable Exploit, and besides provoked by the Insolence of Lautrech and the Bishop of Tarbe his Minister, who would not admit into the State of Milan any of his Decrees, or Ecclesiastical Provisions, but rejected them with very scornful and insolent Speeches, resolved to enter into a Confederacy with Cæsar against the King of France. The Emperor irritated by the War of Navarre, stimulated by many of the Milaneſe Exiles, and excited also by many of his own Council, that were desirous to humble the Greatness of Cheures, who had always dissuaded a Separation from the King of France, determined to join in Alliance with the Pontiff against the King. What hastened his Resolution is supposed to be the Hopes that, by the Authority of the Pontiff together with his own, he might easily weaken the League made with the Swiss before it was consolidated by Gifts and Gratifications. And what induced the Pope to put the more Confidence in this Alliance was that Cæsar, after he had given an Hearing in the Diet of Worms to Martin Luther, whom

A. D.

A. D. he had invited thither under a safe Conduct, and caused his Opinions to be examined by a Number of Divines, who made their Report that his Doctrine was erroneous, and pernicious to the Christian Religion, had, to gratify the Pontiff, put him under the Ban of the Empire; which so terrified Martin that, if the injurious and highly threatening Words which were given him by the Cardinal of San Sisto the Apostolical Legate had not thrown him into the utmost Despair, it is believed it would have been easy, by giving him some Preferment, or providing for him some honourable Way of Living, to make him renounce his Errors. But however that be, the Confederacy between the Pontiff and the Emperor was concluded without the Knowledge of Cheures, who had hitherto exercised the greatest Authority in such Affairs, and seasonably happened to die about this Time. The League was made for their common Defence, including the House of the Medici, and the Florentines, with an additional Contract; that a War shall commence against the State of Milan at such Time and in such Manner as shall be agreed between the Parties: A. D.

That after its Acquisition Parma and Piacenza shall be left to the Church to be held by the same Title as in Times past: That since Francesco Sforza, who was in Exile at Trent, laid Claim to the State of Milan, by Virtue of his Father's Investiture, and his Brother's Renunciation, he shall be put in Possession of it as soon as acquired, and the Confederates shall be bound to maintain and defend him in it: That no other Salts shall be consumed in the Dutchy of Milan than those of Cervia: And that the Pope shall be permitted not only to proceed against his own Subjects and Feudatories, but Cæsar also shall be obliged, as soon as he has conquered the State of Milan, to assist him against them, and particularly for the Acquisition of Ferrara. The Tribute of the Kingdom of Naples was raised, the Cardinal de' Medici was promised a Pension of Ten Thousand Ducats on the Archbishopric of Toledo, newly vacant, and an Estate of the yearly Revenue of Ten Thousand Ducats in the Kingdom of Naples was to be settled on Alessandro de' Medici, natural Son of Le- renzo late Duke of Urbino.

pire on
of Milan.

FOR the better Elucidation of these Affairs it seems necessary to give some short Account of the Rights which Cæsar pretended the Empire had at that Time upon the Dutchy of Milan. It was asserted on the Part of Cæsar that the antient Rights of the Dukes of Orleans to that State were of no Validity, because the Contract of the Succession of Madame Valentine had not been confirmed by the Imperial Authority ; and that at present it belonged immediately to the Empire, because the Investiture made to Lodovico Sforza for himself and his Sons had been revoked by his Grandfather Maximilian with an Amplification of so many Clauses that the Revocation had judicially taken Effect to the Prejudice especially of the Sons, who never having been in Possession had a Right only in Expectation, but not in Fact. Wherefore the Investiture made to King Lewis for himself and his Daughter Claude would have been valid in case she had been married to Charles, and with a Condition that if the Marriage did not follow without any Fault of Charles, it should be void, and that

Milan should directly pass to Charles, who A. D.
1521. in such a Case was invested with it in the Presence of Philip his Father. From the Premises it was inferred that the second Investiture made to the said King Lewis, for himself, for the said Claude, and for Angoulesme was of no Validity to the Prejudice of Charles the Pupil, and constituted under the Tuition of Maximilian; and the present King having no Foundation for any Claim on account of this Investiture, much less could he alledge that this Dutchy belonged to him by new Rights, because he had neither obtained nor demanded the Investiture of Cæsar; and it was manifest that the Cession made by Massimiliano Sforza when he surrendered to him the Castle of Milan could do him no Service, because a Fief alienated by private Authority reverts immediately to the supreme Lord; and because Massimiliano, tho' admitted by Consent of Cæsar, dying in that State without ever receiving the Investiture, could not transfer to others those Rights which never belonged to himself.

Designs of the Pope and Cæsar against the
France.

THE Confederacy being thus made, tho' very privately, between the Pontiff and Cæsar against the King of France, it was resolved between them, before they proceeded to open Acts of Hostility, to make an Attempt either by secret Conspiracy or sudden Attack, with the Help of some Exiles, both at once on Milan and Genoa. Orders were therefore given for Cæsar's Gallies, which were at Naples, and those of the Pope to present themselves on a sudden in the Port of Genoa with Two Thousand Spanish Foot on board, convoying also Girolamo Adorno, by Means of whose Authority and Attendance, the Partisans of the Adorni in the Rivieras putting themselves in Motion at the same Time by his Procurement, they were in Hopes of exciting an Insurrection in that City. On the other Hand Francesco Sforza and Girolamo Morone, who resided with him at Trent, with many of the principal Exiles, were consulting on a Method for suddenly attacking the French Troops in their Quarters at Parma, Piacenza and Cremona, and the

the same was to be attempted in Milan; ^{A. D.} and that Manfredi Palavicino, and Matto ^{1521.} di Brinzi, Head of a Party in those Mountains, should convey some German Foot by the Lake of Como for attacking that City, where it was assured he held secret Intelligence; and that if these Enterprises succeeded, or any one of the most important, the Milaneſe Exiles, who were many of them Persons of Quality, and were privately to remove their Quarters to Reggio, where Girolamo Morone was to be on a Day appointed, should put themselves in Motion for entering the State of Milan with Three Thousand Foot, who were to be got ready as soon as possible. For this Purpose the Pope remitted Ten Thousand Ducats to Fran- cesco Guicciardini, who had been many Years Governor of Modena and Reggio, with Orders to give them to Morone, for making secret Levies of Foot to be in Readiness on the Success of these Undertakings, which Guicciardini favoured, but privately, and in such a Manner, that the King of France had no Reason to complain of the Conduct of his Officers, or inter-abortive.

BUT every one of these Enterprises miscarried : The Fleet that went to Genoa, composed of seven light Galleys, four Brigantines, and some other Vessels, in vain presented itself before the Port ; for the Doge Fregoso, forewarned of their Coming, had seasonably provided the Town, on which the Squadron perceiving no Commotion or Alteration, retired to the Eastern Riviera. And in Lombardy many of the Exiles talking too freely of the Designs that were in Agitation, and that Girolamo Morone was to come to Reggio, it came to the Ears of Federigo da Bozzolo, who went to Milan and notified it to L'Escud, who supplied in Milan the Place of his Brother, departed not long before to France. L'Escud calling together the Men at Arms, who were quartered in different Places, and giving Orders to Federigo to lead One Thousand Foot from his own Castles, immediately marched with Four Hundred Lances for Parma, assuring himself every Step of the the Way more and more of the Truth of A. D. what Federigo had reported to him. For ^{1521.} the Exiles not observing the Orders which had been given them to assemble themselves in private, had openly marched to Reggio, making Demands of Mén in all the circumjacent Places, and giving manifest Signs that they were to attempt Innovations without Delay. And Girolamo Morone, who arrived after them, continued in the same Way of Proceeding, induced, perhaps, because the more openly he proceeded, the more Enmity he would breed between the Pontiff and the King.

THE Vanity of these Devices was already apparent to all, and yet L'Escud being arrived at Parma resolved the next Morning on the Day solemnized for the Birth of St. John the Baptist to present himself before the Gates of Reggio, in Hopes of an Opportunity of taking all or Part of the Exiles, either imagining that as soon as they perceived his Coming they would fly out of the Town, or that, because there were no foreign Soldiers in the Place, the Governor, a Man of a Pro-

A. D. 1521. Profession quite different from that of Arms, would in a Fright deliver them up as Prisoners, or perhaps hoping that the Consternation of the Inhabitants might give him an Opportunity to enter the City. The Governor had some Fore-sight of this, and tho', the Attack of Genoa not being as yet known, it did not seem probable to him that L'Escud would, without the King's Orders, in a manner begin a War by entering in an hostile Way the Dominions of the Pope, yet considering how frequently the Impetuosity of the French carries them beyond due Bounds, he immediately sent an Express to Guido Rangone, who was in the Modenese, to desire him to hasten that same Night to Reggio; he ordered that Part of Morone's Foot which were quartered in the nearest Places to come also that Night into the Place, and the People of the Town whom he knew to have an Aversion to the French, to repair, at the Sound of a Bell to the Guard of the Gates, assigning to every one his Charge. L'Escud came the next Morning with Four Hundred Lances, followed, but at some Miles distance, distance, by Federigo da Bozzolo with One ^{A. D.} Thousand Foot. As soon as he approach- ^{1521.} ed the Town he sent Bonneval, one of his Officers, to the Governor to demand a Parley, and it was agreed that L'Escud should come to the Wicket that opens into the Ravelin of the Gate that looks towards Parma, and that the Governor should repair to the same Place, each of them taking the other's Word for his Security. L'Escud came according to Appointment, and dismounting, attended by several Gentlemen, approached the Wicket at which the Governor went forth, and they began to enter into Discourse; one ^{Parleys with the} complaining that Reception and Encou- ^{Governor.} ragement were given to Exiles assembled to disturb the Peace of the King's Dominions in the Towns of the Church, contrary to the Articles of the Confederacy; the other, that L'Escud had with an armed Force suddenly entered the State of the Church.

AT this Juncture some of the People having, contrary to Orders, opened one of the Gates for introducing a Waggon loaded with Meal, and the Troops of L'Escud

A. D. ^{1521.} L'Escud. being dispersed about the Wall, and surrounding Part of it, Bonneval, who stood over against the Gate that was opened, spurred forward with some Men at Arms to gain an Entrance. But he was repulsed, and the Gate shut in a great Hurry and Bustle, the Noise of which reaching the Place where L'Escud and the Governor were in Conference, was the Occasion that the Townsmen and some of the Exiles who covered the Walls of the Ravelin discharged their Pieces against those that stood near to L'Escud, and mortally wounded Alessandro da Trivulzi, who died two Days after, certainly deserving a better Fate because he had dissuaded the Coming before Reggio. The rest fled, and nothing saved L'Escud but the Fear of those who wanted to fire at him lest they should hit the Governor. But he was in a great Consternation, and complaining that Faith had been broken with him, knew not how to resolve on Staying or Flying, when the Governor took him by the Hand, and encouraging him, upon his Word of Honour, to follow him, led him into the Ravelin, accompanied by none of his

 man. And it is surprising that all the Men at Arms, as soon as they understood that L'Escud was entered within the Wall, the Word passing among them that he had been made a Prisoner, betook themselves to Flight in such a Panic that many of them threw away their Lances on the Road. Very few indeed waited for L'Escud, who after a long Conference, and being certified that the Disorder was occasioned by his own Men, was dismissed by the Governor, as well out of Regard to his Word of Honour as to the Instructions that he had received from the Pontiff to make no Show of any Design against the King, for which Reasons he did not think proper to detain him.
 Neither would the keeping him a Prisoner have been followed, as many at that time imagined, by a Revolt of the State of Milan; for the Men at Arms, tho' put to Flight, having none to pursue them,

Order; and the Terror, which had begun to spread itself in Parma and Milan on the first Advices that L'Escud was a Prisoner, and the Men at Arms routed, would have made no further Progress, after Intelligence had been received that the Men at Arms were in Safety, especially since there was no Army near at Hand nor Force sufficient to cause any Movement, and there remained many other Officers of Men at Arms in those Cities. L'Escud, after assembling his Horse and Foot, retired to Coriagio, a Village in the Reggian; six Miles from Reggio, from whence after a few Days he retired over the Lenza into the Parmesan, having dispatched La Motte to Rome to justify to the Pontiff the Reasons of his March to Reggio, and to make Instances with his Holiness that, in pursuance of the Articles of the Confederacy between the King and himself, he would expel the King's rebellious Subjects out of the State of the Church.

Sad Accident in Milan.

BUT an Accident that about this Time happened at Milan greatly dejected the Spirits Spirits of the French, as if Heaven forewarned them by manifest Signs of their future Calamities. For on the Day so-lemnised in Memory of the Death of the Prince of the Apostles, the Sun being just set in a clear Sky, there fell from on high through the Air as it were a Fire before the Gate of the Castle, where lay a Number of Barrels of Gunpowder that were brought out of the Castle in order to be sent to certain Fortresses, which were kindled by it, and blew up with a vast Noise, and horrible Shock, that ruined to the very Foundation a Tower of very beautiful Marble erected over the Gate with a Clock on its Top, and not only the Tower but the Walls and Chambers of the Castle, and other Buildings contiguous to the Tower, the inconceivable Violence of the Blast, and the Fall of such great Fabrics at the same time shaking all the Edifices of the Castle, and the whole City of Milan. Huge Stones and Masses from the Ruins were whirled with incredible Force this Way and that Way through the Air in a frightful Manner.

 Multitudes were wounded by the Repercussion

cussion of the Stones, and others buried under the Ruins, with which the Square before the Castle was covered to such a Degree that it was quite astonishing to see such a Heap of Stones, some of which of a vast Bigness were blown to the Distance of above Five Hundred Paces. And it happening to be the proper Time when the Men, to refresh themselves after the Heat of the Day, were walking and passing through the Square, above One Hundred and Fifty of the Garrison perished, and the Governors of the Fort and Castle, and the rest of the Soldiers were so astonished, and deprived of Courage and Counsel, and so great a Length of the Wall was fallen down, that it would have been very easy for the People, had they made any Commotion, to have seized that Night on the Castle.

BUT the Pontiff, as soon as he had Advice of the Appearance of L'Escud before the Gates of Reggio, embracing the Opportunity to justify his own Actions, made most grievous Complaints of the Insult in the Consistory of Cardinals, and concealing the Confederacy which he had already before privately contracted with Cæsar, with the Orders given for their Gallies to act in Conjunction against Genoa, represented that the Design of L'Escud to seize on Reggio was a Demonstration of the evil Disposition of the King of France towards the Apostolic See, for which Reason he was under a Necessity of providing for its Defence by entering into an Alliance with Cæsar, who had never yet discovered any Dispositions but such as were worthy of a Christian Prince, as well in all his other Actions, as in his late Zeal shown at Worms when he so ardently undertook the Patronage of Religion. Thus pretending to contract anew with Don Giovanni Manuello, Ambassador of Cæsar, the Confederacy which had been contracted before, they immediately called to Rome Prospera Colonna, to whom they agreed to commit the Management of the Enterprize, in order to consult with him by what Methods and with what Forces they had best to act in open Hostilities, since Plots and Surprises had proved unsuccessful. For neither had the Plot at Como it seems taken Matto di Brinzi with Eight Hundred German and Italian Foot had approached the Walls by Night, in Hopes that Antonio Rusco, a Burgher of that City, would break down so much of the Wall near the House in which he lived, as would give them an Entrance into the Town, where, because there were but few French, they imagined they should meet with no Resistance. But after they had waited a long Time to no Purpose, the Governor of the Town assembling all the French, and such of the Comeſe as he thought best affected, made a sudden Attack on those without, though much superior in Number, and put them to Flight with so much Ease, that many believed he had corrupted the Commander of the Germans with Money and Promises. Three Boats were sunk in the Lake, seven taken, and many of the Enemy, among whom were Manfredi and Matto, in their Flight by the Way of the Mountains. All the German Foot were set at Liberty, but the others were conducted to Milan, where Manfredi and Matto were publicly quartered, having first

first confessed that Bartolomeo Ferrero, a Milanese, a Person of considerable Interest, ^{A. D. 1521.} was privy to the Conspiracy carried on by Morone. Ferrero was imprisoned together with his Son, and condemned to the same Punishment, for not discovering the secret Correspondence held by Morone for effecting a Revolution, and raising a Rebellion against the King.

AT this Time the Pope, knowing the great Conveniencies of the State of Man-^{Marquis}toua for carrying on a War in Lombardy, of Man-^{Marquis} took into his Service under the Title of Captain General of the Church Federigo^{General of} the Marquis of Mantoua with Two Hundred ^{Church.} Men at Arms and Two Hundred light Horse. But the Marquis, before he entered into the Pope's Pay, renounced the Order of St. Michael with which he had been invested by the King of France, to whom he sent back the Collar and the Badge which the King presents to those who are taken into that Order.

ceeding in the War, it was resolved by the Pope and the Imperial Ambassador, with the Advice of Prospero Colonna; that the State of Milan should be attacked as soon as possible from the Borders of the Ecclesiastic Dominions by the Men at Arms of the Pope and of the Florentines. The Number of those Troops, including those brought into the Service by the Marquis of Mantoua, amounted to Six Hundred effective Men; and they were to be joined by the Men at Arms which Cæsar had in the Kingdom of Naples, who were about the same Number. It was resolved also to raise Six Thousand Italian Foot, and that the Army, which was to assemble between the Modenese and the Reggian should be reinforced by the Two Thousand Spanish Foot that were with Adorno in the Riviera of Genoa, and Two Thousand others that the Marquis of Pescara was to lead from the Kingdom of Naples; to take into Pay, at the joint Expence of the Pontiff and Cæsar, Four Thousand German Foot, and Two Thousand Grisons, to which were to be added Two Thousand Swiss who had voluntarily remained in the Service

Service of the Pontiff, for the rest being ^{A. D.} tired with so long a State of Inaction, and ^{1521.} their Time of Harvest approaching, were returned to their own Habitations before L'Escud came to Reggio, the Pope in vain endeavouring to retain them after they had cost him an Hundred and Fifty Thousand Ducats to no Purpose. Moreover, it was determined that besides these Preparations Instances should be made with the Swiss Cantons, by the Authority of the Pontiff and Cæsar, for Leave to hire a Body of Six Thousand of their Foot, which was no more than what they were obliged to grant by the Conventions which the Pope had made with them, and that they would refuse the King of France the same Liberty, the Pontiff alledging that his Confederacy with them was of a longer Date than that which they had contracted with the King. It was further resolved, if these Demands should be granted, to attack the Dutchy of Milan on the Side towards Como, where it was hoped that an Insurrection might be easily excited by the great Number of Exiles of very honourable Families, and because the Affection which the People used to bear to the Name of King Lewis was changed into a great Degree of Hatred, since the Men at Arms which were disposed in their ordinary Stations for the Guard of that State, being but ill paid on account of the Disorders in the Finances of the King, who, partly out of Necessity, partly from Choice, had overburthen'd himself with extraordinary Expences, lived in a very licentious Manner. Nor did the royal Governors, presuming on the King's Negligence, administer that Justice which used to be administered in the Time of the late King, who having a great Affection for the Dutchy of Milan had always taken a particular Care of its Interests. It bore hard also upon the People that they were constrained, after the Custom of France, to lodge the French Officers and Soldiers in their own Houses, and though it was not at their own Expence, yet being perpetual it was become highly inconvenient and troublesome. And though it might be alledged that they had supported the same Burden in the Time of the late King, who, excusing himself by the Example of the City

City of Paris, had never been pleased to exempt the Milaneſe from this Inconvenience, yet being attended with the aforementioned Grievances, it ſeemed at preſent more inſupportable. To all this was added the Nature of the People, who are deſirous of Novelties, and the Inclination which Men have to free themſelves from preſent Troubles, which is ſo ardent as to make them diſcard all Care and Conſideration of future Events.

THE Fame of the War reſolved by the Pope and Cæſar with ſuch powerful Preparations coming to the Ears of the King of France conſtrained him to make no leſs powerful Proviſions for the Defence of the Dutchy of Milan. And the firſt Step to be taken for this Purpoſe was that Lautrech, who was come to Court on his private Concerns, ſhould immediately return to Milan. That General, ſuſpecting the Inconſtancy and Negligence of the King and the Miniſtry, at firſt reſuſed to go unleſs there were paid him down in ready Money Three Hundred Thouſand Ducats, which he affirmed would ſuffice for

A. D. for the Defence of that State; but at length being prevailed on by the earnest Instances of the King and his Mother, and deceived by their Word of Honour which they had given him, and by the Ministers who were at the Head of the Administration of the Finances, who had made him believe that he should find the Money he demanded in readiness on his first Arrival at Milan, he returned with the utmost Expedition to that City, and with great Sollicitude made the necessary Provisions for the Defence of that Dutchy. For this End he had resolved, with the King's Approbation, that the royal Men at Arms which were at that Time in Lombardy should be joined by the Six Hundred Men at Arms and Six Thousand Foot that were to be furnished according to Treaty by the Venetians, who readily offered them, and had already put in Motion their Men at Arms in the Veronese and Brescian. They had determined also to list a Body of Ten Thousand Swiss, assuring themselves that they should not be refused that Liberty on account of the new Confederacy, and to cause Six Thousand Volunteers to pass pass from France into Italy, there to be A. D.

 provided they were in Hopes either of being in a Condition to venture without much Hazard the Fortune of a Battle, or if their Force should be too weak for an Engagement, that at least it would be sufficient for providing the Towns with competent Garrisons, and by temporising on the Defence to tire out the Enemies; one of whom by his natural Prodigality, and Expences in the War of Urbino, was exhausted of Money; and the other, it was believed, could not be supplied from his Kingdoms with Treasure sufficient for long supporting so burdensome a War. Besides, they imagined that Alfonso da Este, in Despair of his own State if the Pope should obtain the Victory, would either put himself in Motion to recover his lost Territories, or at least, by keeping himself in Arms, would hold the Pope in such Suspense as would necessitate him to leave a good Number of Soldiers for the Security of the Towns in the Neighbourhood of his Dominions. Such were the Resolutions and Preparations on both sides, the King,

The Armies take the Field.

PROSPERO COLONNA was at that Time in Bologna, where, without waiting for the Troops that were to come from the Kingdom of Naples, and the German Infantry, he assembled the other Forces, and leaving sufficient Garrisons in Modena, Reggio, Bologna, Ravenna and Imola, out of a Suspicion of the Duke of Ferrara, he came to an Encampment on the River Lenza, five Miles from Parma, full of Hopes that the French would not be able to obtain any Troops of the Swiss, and that by this Means, and by the Dissaffection of the People, they would be obliged to think rather of abandoning than of defending the State of Milan. But it happened otherwise, for the Cantons, contrary to the most pressing Instances of the Cardinal of Sion, and of the Ambassadors of the Pontiff and Cæsar, resolved to grant the King the Troops with which they were bound to furnish him by the Articles of the last Convention, and while they were getting getting in Readiness Giorgio Soprasasso was arrived at Milan with Four Thousand Foot of the Vallesi. Lautrech therefore willing to defend Parma had sent thither his Brother L'Escud with Four Hundred Lances, and Five Thousand Italian Foot commanded by Federigo da Bozzolo. He was assured also that the Venetians were assembling their Troops at Ponte Vico in order to march to the Assistance of the French, and that the Duke of Ferrara was lifting Foot. Wherefore Prospero being sensible that he wanted a greater Force, rested seven Days in his Camp, in which Time he was joined by Four Hundred Spanish Lances commanded by Antonio da Leva, which came from the Kingdom of Naples, and by the Marquis of Mantoua with Part of his Troops. The Arrival however of the Marquis, Captain General of all the Forces of the Church, made no Alteration in the Authority of Prospero Colonna, in whose Person it had pleased the Pontiff and Cæsar that the Government of the whole Army, though without any Title, should reside; or rather the supreme Power of commanding all the Troops of the Church,

A. D. 1521. and the Marquis of Mantoua in particular was in Francesco Guicciardini, who had the Title of Commissary General of the Army, but with a very ample Authority above what is usually conferred on Commissaries.

AFTER this Prospero Colunno advanced with his Army to St. Lazzaro, a Mile from Parma, on the Road that leads to Reggio, with a Resolution to proceed no further till the Arrival of the Marquis of Pescara, who was expected from the Kingdom of Naples with Three Hundred Lances, and Two Thousand Spanish Foot, and till he was also joined by the German Infantry. All this while they did, no other Damage to the Parmesans than by labouring to turn the Course of the Waters, and to break the Mills, so as to render it difficult for them to grind their Corn. But the Expectations of the Public depended on the Arrival of the Germans, against whom the Venetians, at the Instances of the French, sent Part of their Troops into the Veronese to prevent their Passage; for they were come as far as Inspruck, where they insisted on receiving their first Month's Pay at Trent, ^{A. D. 1521.} and to be met at the Foot of the Mountain of Monte Baldo, which was the Road they said they would take, by a Body of Cavalry, under whose Escort they might advance forwards with the greater Security. Wherefore Prospero had sent to Mantoua Two Hundred light Horse, which was to join Two Thousand Foot levied in the Mantouan, and to march forwards with the Artillery of the Marquis, who, to gratify the Pontiff and Cæsar, acted, in all Respects, as if it were his own Cause, and not as a Mercenary. It was more difficult to pay the Germans at Trent, for tho' the Pope disbursed the Money for Cæsar as well as his own Share, it could not be conveyed through the Territories of the Venetians without great Danger. The Germans after this being advised of the Opposition of the Venetians demanded greater Assistance, varying also in the Time of passing the Mountains, and beginning their March. On this Account the Marquis of Pescara, who was arrived in the Modenese turned his March into the Mantouan,

A. D. touan, whither also Two Hundred Men at Arms, and Three Hundred Spanish Foot were sent from the Camp. At last the Germans themselves, impatient of waiting the Time which they had signified, sent new Advice that they would anticipate five Days, declaring also that they would wait but one Day for the Arrival of the Horse at the Foot of Monte Baldo, and that if these Troops did not arrive they would march back again. It being impracticable for the Marquis of Pescara to be there at the Time required, it was necessary for Guido Rangone and Luigi da Gonzaga to march thither with all possible Speed from the Camp. But all this Trouble and Hurry were needless; for, as Prospero had always declared, the Venetians had it not in their Power to hinder the Passage of Six Thousand Foot, for so many in Number were these Troops, consisting of Germans and Grisons, whose firm and close Array would have sustained the Attacks of their Horse, and the Italian Foot would not have had the Boldness to look them in the Face. For this Reason, and because the Senate, who shunned all Occasions of bringing the War into their own Territories, chose rather to satisfy the French with Shews than Effects, the Forces of the Venetians, on the Day before the Germans were to pass, retired towards Verona; the Germans then proceeded to Valeggio without Opposition, and the next Day entered the Mantouan. But when the Marquis of Pescara was arrived in the Camp, the Army, which had rested thirteen Days at St. Lazzaro, marched the next Day and encamped at San Martino, where they were the same Day joined by the Germans and Grisons.

ALL the Forces that were designed being thus assembled together, Consultations began to be held on their future Proceedings. Some in Council proposed as most expedient the making themselves Masters of Parma, because it was the first Town of the Frontier, and if it was left behind their Backs the Army could not with Safety march forwards, on account of the Difficulty of supplying the Camp with Victuals, and the Danger of having their Convoys of Money and other necessary Provisions intercepted by the Enemy; besides, the Towns between Parma and Bologna would lie too open, and exposed to many Inconveniences. The Troops that were in Parma, they said, consisting for the most part of Men levied in Haste, were but of little Value, and of these some every Day fled out of the Town, on account of the Difficulty of Pay, and the Scarcity of Meal in the Place. The City was of a great Compass, and the People disaffected, and, tho' disheartened, ready to resume fresh Spirits whenever they should perceive the Approach of an Army to their Walls, so that if the Place were attacked on several Quarters at once, it would be difficult for the French to resist the Assaults of the Enemy from without, and at the same Time to secure themselves from the Com-motions of the Populace within. Others alledged that the City was well fortified, and had a sufficient Garrison; that the Foot which deserted were of no Value nor Service, but the most useful and expert Infantry remained in the Place, besides a good Number of French Lances, zolo, and so many other great Officers would not have shut themselves up within that City: That the Conquest of Towns, on account of the Alterations that have within a short Space of Time been made in the Methods of War, and in the Art of defending Places, is well known to have become more difficult: That it ought carefully to be considered how greatly the Army would suffer in its Reputation if it failed of Success in its first Enterprise: That every one must presuppose it necessary for the Artillery to be planted against Parma at two different Places. But where could they find in the Camp the Artillery and the other Provisions in sufficient Quantities for that Purpose? And they could not be conveyed thither in less Time than some Days, which Delay, besides their having wasted too much Time already, would give an Opportunity for Lautrech, who was every Day expected at Cremona, to join the Venetian Troops and a greater Number of Swiss, Part of them being already arrived, and with the Volunteer Foot which were expected from France, and were reported to be all near at Hand. What should they do if, while the Army was busily employed about Parma, Lautrech should come and post himself in some neighbouring Place, whence, without suffering himself to be forced to a Battle, he might annoy our Convoys of Forage and Provisions which are every Day coming from Reggio, and have already received continual Molestations from the Garrison of Parma? It was more advisable therefore to provide the Camp with Victuals for some Days, and leaving Parma behind to march on a sudden to Piacenza, which, tho' a City of much greater Compass, had but a small Garrison, and no Fortifications or Artillery, and where the People were of the same Disposition as those in Parma but more at Liberty to make it known, not having been under the same Depression and Restraint as the others, and there being also so inconsiderable a Number of Troops in the Place, it was not to be doubted but that they might immediately take it on the first Approach. Prospero

was much inclined to this Advice, and ^{A. D.} declared that he knew a Place where it ^{1521.} would be impossible to stop his Entrance, and that it was the same by which formerly Francesco Sforza, at that time General of the Milaneſe, victoriously forced his Way into the City againſt the Venetians who had ſeized on it after the Death of Filippo Maria Viſconti : That there was a vaſt Plenty of Proviſions in Piacenza, and that the Place lay ſo convenient for attacking Milan that the French would be neceſſitated to draw almoſt their whole Force to that Capital, by which Means the Cities in the Neighbourhood of Parma would be freed from Danger, and, what is more, Proſpero promiſed himſelf that if he paſſed the Po only with the light Horſe, and advanced with all Speed to Milan, that City at the Sound of his Name would make an Inſurrection. And this was the Scheme he had laid even before his Departure from Bologna, in purſuance of which, as he thought he ſhould have no Occaſion for beſieging any Town, he had neglected to provide himſelf

A. D. self with an extraordinary Quantity of 1521. Artillery and Ammunition.

IN this Variety of Opinions it was determined, but very secretly, by those who had Authority to pass a Resolution, that, as soon as the Army was provided with Bread and Meal sufficient to subsist them for four Days, Five Hundred Men at Arms, Part of the light Horse, the Spanish Infantry, and Fifteen Hundred Italian Foot, should advance with the utmost Expedition to Piacenza, to be followed by the rest of the Army, which, on account of bringing along the Artillery, Provisions, and of so many other Incumbrances, could proceed but slowly. And it was firmly believed that on the Arrival of the first Part of the Forces the City would immediately cry up the Name of the Church, and if that should not succeed, all Succours at least would be by their Means prevented from entering the Place, so that when the rest of the Army came up they might without Doubt make themselves Masters of the Town. But it happened that on the Day preceding that in which the Army was to move some French Horse passing the Po made an Excursion as far as Busseto, whence a Report was spread that the whole French Army had passed the Po, which prevented the aforesaid Resolution from taking Effect, and delayed the Departure of the Troops till the Truth should be discovered, for which Purpose Giovanni de' Medici, Commander of the Pope's light Horse, was ordered out with Four Hundred Horse to get Intelligence. But what principally confounded this Resolution was the ambitious Emulation that arose between Prospero and the Marquis of Pescara, between whom, even before this Time, there was no good Harmony. Prospero proposed to lead the first Part of the Army himself, and the Marquis on the other Side alledged that the Spanish Infantry, of which he was Captain General, should not go on any Expedition without him. By means of this Emulation between the Generals, which is often prejudicial to the Affairs of Princes, it happened that, though it was known but a few Hours after that the French Detachment was returned on the other Side the

A. D. Po, and that Lautrech made no Motion, yet the first Resolution was not executed; but rather, on the contrary, through the Difference of Opinions, and the natural Slowness of Prospero, the Time of Inaction would have been spun out to a greater Length, if the Apostolical Commissary had not stimulated the Generals by pathetic Speeches to push the War with Vigour, remonstrating to them how much the Pope, and justly, was displeased at the Slowness of their Proceeding, and that they had now no Excuse to plead with him for such unreasonable Dilatoriness, which had been hitherto tolerated in Expectation first of the Spaniards, and afterwards of the Germans. The Commissary had hardly ended his Admonitions when it was resolved, rather by a kind of hasty Impulse than from mature Counsel, to lay Siege to Parma, the same Persons who had but the Day before been of a contrary Opinion, being now confident that a happy Issue of the Enterprize might justly be expected, especially from the continual Desertion of great Numbers of Foot from Parma for Want of Pay and Bread. But it was necessary to

to interpose a further Delay of some Days ^{A. D.} for conveying two more Cannon from Bo- ^{1521.} logna, and providing many Things necessary for a formal Siege of Towns with Artillery, which Prospero. as we said before, had rejected. This Neglect, or Alteration of the Resolution, was of vast Detriment to the Enterprize, for it gave Lautrech the more Time to assemble the Forces which he expected from France, from the Venetians, and from the Swiss. So much is it the Duty of wise Generals, who consider how often it may be necessary in Wars to alter Resolutions according to the Variety of Accidents, to make Provisions in the Beginning as much as possible accommodated to all Incidents and to all Counsels. While the Army lay idle nothing passed about Parma but very slight Skirmishes.

At last, on the thirteenth Day of their Encampment at San Martino, the Army ^{Siege of Parma.} passed the River of Parma in the Night, and encamped on the Roman Road in the Suburbs of the Gate called Santa Croce that leads to Piacenza, which L'Escud had the

A. D. the Day before, on foreseeing the Enemy's Coming, caused to be burnt. The City of Parma is divided by a River of the same Name, whose Waters are not so deep but that it may at any Time, except in very rainy Seasons, be forded. The lesser Part, which is about a Third of the Whole, is inhabited by the meaner Sort of People, who call it Codiponte, and is situated towards Piacenza. The Generals chose this Place as most convenient for preventing Succours from entering Parma, and much more because the Wall was weak on that Side, and situated in such a Manner that it could not take the Besiegers in Flank. The Marquis, who had the Day before gone with some Officers to take a View of the Place, reported that it was practicable to begin with battering the Wall that same Day; but it having been necessary, in order to ruin the Defences, first to batter down a Tower that stood over the Gate, and was very strong and thick, a whole Day was spent about it, during which a large Culverin burst. The Night following the Cannon were planted against the Wall on the Left of the Gate, as you go in, and it was designed to do A. D. the same on the Right, leaving the Gate 1521.

 in the Midst between the battered Places.
 But it being impossible for the Besiegers to plant Artillery in two separate Places because they had brought with them no more than six Cannon and two large Culverins, it was imagined that this Method, by forcing the Garrison to extend themselves through one long Space in order to their Defence, would in a Manner produce the same Effect. But this was not put in Execution, because on that Side there was, on the Brink of the Ditch that surrounded the Walls, a Bank, so high, that, before it was levelled or opened, which could not be done in a short Time, it would prevent the Artillery from striking the Wall*.
 The Battery did great Execution on the Wall, which was old, and very weak, and two Breaches being made of sufficient Breadth, the Generals talked of storming the Place the same Day, but came to no firm Resolution. But the Marquis, who
 with

 same with what is now called a Counter-scarp, which about this Time seems to have been in its Rudiments.

A. D. with the Spanish Infantry had all the Charge of the Battery, having ordered some Soldiers to look into the Breach, and observe, if it were possible, the Condition of the Works on the Inside, these Fellows had no sooner got upon the broken Wall than they began to call out aloud to the Army to approach and enter the Place. On this the Spanish and Italian Foot ran in a tumultuous and disorderly Manner to the Wall, which they reached, and had already begun to climb the Breach, upon which Girolamo Guicciardini Captain of Foot was killed, when the Generals taking the Alarm hastened to the Place, and considering that an Assault, and much more a weak, disorderly and tumultuous Attack, would be fruitless caused them to retire. This Accident either quashed the Design, or furnished Excuses for not giving a regular Assault on that Day. On the next the Besiegers employed themselves in battering the intire Part of the Wall between the two Breaches, and a Flankwork raised on the Tower of the Gate at the inner Side. But a Report spreading itself in the Army that the French had fortified themselves selves with such great Works that it would A. D. be very difficult to take the Place fairly by 1521.

 Storm, the Generals sent two Soldiers of each Language to take a View of the Breaches, who either through Fear or Carelessness, or, perhaps, as some doubted, suborned, reported that the Remains of the battered Wall were above five Braces in Height from the Ground, and that on the Inside the Besieged had drawn a deep Foss, and cast up such other Works, that the Generals, doubting they had no other Way to become Masters of the Place, resolved on working of Mines at the Side of the broken Wall, and to cut the contiguous Wall with Chissels and Pickaxes, for filling up with the Ruins the Ditch which the Besieged were said to have digged on the Inside, and to facilitate the Entrance.
 As soon as these Works should be brought to Perfection, and two Pieces of Cannon, which were coming from Mantoua, added to the Artillery which was in the Army, another Battery was to be erected where the Wall, after extending itself in a right Line to a great Distance on the Right of the Gate, turns and forms an Angle, at which which Quarter when the Wall is thrown down the Defendants on the inner Side may be taken in Flank. Pursuant to this Resolution, on that Side which had been battered, they began to work on a Trench, and a few Days after on another for ruining the Wall with Mines; but these Works proceeded but slowly, as well because, Prospero having formed different Designs, all the necessary Provisions for these laborious Undertakings were not ready in the Camp, as because the Ground where they digged proved difficult and hard.

Motions
of Lautrech.

WHILE the Army was employed in carrying on these Works with an Intention not to storm the Place till they were finished, Lautrech, who had so long delayed to put himself in Motion on account of the Slowness of the Troops which were coming to his Army, having now got together the greatest Part advanced five Miles more forwards, keeping along the River, having under his Command Five Hundred Lances, about Seven Thousand Swiss, Four Thousand Foot with which M. de St. Valier had joined him that Day from from France, and Four Hundred Men at Arms and Four Thousand Foot under Teodoro da Trivulzi General of the Vene- tians and Andrea Gritti the Proveditor.

This Army was attended by the Duke of Urbino and Marc' Antonio Colonna, the last as in the King's Service, though without Title or Regiment, and the Duke in Pursuit of such Hopes as are common to Exiles. The General was in Expectation of Six Thousand more Swiss, granted him by the Cantons, and now on the Road, but according to their Custom marching but slowly, and with many Difficulties. Had he been joined by them, he would not have refused to try the Fortune of a Battle for the Relief of Parma, for which

End he rested on the Road while he was continually soliciting and expecting their Arrival, taking care not to remove from the Banks of the Po. But being apprehensive that in the mean time his Brother would come to an Agreement with the Enemy, he had sent to excuse his Slowness as occasioned by his Expectation of a farther Reinforcement of Swiss, which was now

A. D. now not far off, and because they who 1521. were with him had made a Difficulty of passing the Po. He assured him, however, that he would advance to some Post in the Neighbourhood of Parma, of which he would give him Notice by several Discharges of Cannon, and the next Day he would draw nearer the Enemy in order to engage them, ordering out some of his Horse to skirmish, with an Intent to give him an Opportunity to fall forth and join his Army. This was what L'Escud sollicited him to undertake, assuring him that he could not hold out above two or three Days in that Part of the Town, and two Days more afterwards in the Part beyond the River, because the Town was large and weak, and he had not above Two Hundred Foot left, for they had deserted in great Multitudes; and the Men at Arms, who amounted to no more than Three Hundred Lances, and underwent the Burden of all the Fatigues, were incapable of making Resistance if they should be attacked on several Quarters.
Lautrech after this, on the Day he had promised promised to approach the Enemy, advanced to Zibello, a Castle less than twenty Miles distant from Parma, whence he detached Four Hundred Horse who made an Excursion up to the very Gates of the Town.

THE Besiegers had now carried on their Mines home to the Wall, and afterwards turned them to a Place where they were to be sprung. Count Guido Rangone with the Italian Foot, of which he was Captain General, began to plant the Artillery against the other Part of the Wall; but the French hearing the Noise and Bustle with which they were managed had abandoned the Codiponte two Hours before, and retired in good Order, and without Tumult, together with their Artillery, on the other side of the River. This being known to the Besiegers the next Morning by Break of Day they entered the Place, partly through the Opening in the Wall, partly by Scaling-ladders, and were most joyfully received by the Parmesans, who were desirous of returning under the Ecclesiastical Dominion. But their Joy was soon turned into bitter Lamentations, for they had their Houses plundered as much as if they had been Enemies. And it is not doubted that, if the Cannon had been planted in the same Place some Days before, the French would in the same Manner have abandoned the Codiponte. The next Business was to open a Way through the Rubbish of the Gates that were thrown down, through which the Cannon being introduced were conveyed to the Bank of the River, and began to play on the Wall that makes the Bank on the other side; but it was by this time so late that but little Execution was expected to be done till the next Day. But on the same Day Lautrech came and encamped on the River Taro, seven Miles from Parma, some imagining that he intended to hazard a Battle, others persuading themselves that he came to concert Measures with his Brother, who in consequence, when he could hold out no longer, was to come forth one Night out of Parma with all his Troops, and be received by the French Army; or else, if he chose to come to an Agreement with the Enemy, might obtain Leave to march out of Par-

ma with Safety to himself and all his Soldiers, and without any Obligation. And A. D.
1521. indeed a Treaty had by Means of the Marquis been set on Foot some Days before with Federigo da Bozzolo, who in visiting the Works had been wounded with a Musket Ball in the Shoulder; but the Negotiation had not proceeded so far as to afford any certain Discovery of the real Intentions of L'Escud. The Truth is, as appeared on good Evidence afterwards, that Lautrech had no Mind to fight before he was joined by the Swiss; for though he was somewhat superior in Number, and in the Goodness of his Men at Arms, and was better provided with Artillery, his Infantry was not to be compared with that of the Enemy's Army, in which the Foot, by a just Computation, amounted to Nine Thousand Germans and Spaniards, Two Thousand Swiss, and above Four Thousand Italians.

BUT let every one here observe on what trifling Accidents depend Things of the greatest Moment in Wars. It happened very opportunely the Night after the

A. D. Army had entered the Codiponte that Advices came from Modena and Bologna

Besiegers

that Alfonso da Este had marched out of Ferrara with an Hundred Men at Arms, Two Hundred light Horse, and Two Thousand Foot, among which were a Thousand Corficans and Italians sent him by Lautreck, and with Twelve Pieces of Cannon, and had surpris'd the Castles of Finale and S. Felice, and it was apprehended that he would make further Advances. This News gave no small Uneasiness to the Generals, who, though they knew long before the Instances made to the Duke by the French, and that there was Reason to be apprehensive of such a Movement, had yet taken no Care to make such Provisions in Modena as should be sufficient in such a Case for the Security of that City. For Prospero, who had always obstinately defended the contrary Opinion, had never consented that any Troops should be sent from the Army to Modena, either because he put too much Faith in the Duke, who was his very good Friend, and with whom also he had, by Order of the Pope, set on Foot a Treaty for an Accommodation ; or because he was unwilling unwilling to weaken the Army by Detach-

 A. D. ^{1521.}
 ments at a Time when the Approach of the Enemy was apprehended, especially as he was by Nature inclined to proceed in all his Measures with Caution and Security, and was therefore desirous of having always a Superiority of Forces; or because, if he had other private Ends, he was not displeased with the present Opportunity.
 But the Night in which the News arrived the Generals assembled in Haste, and it was resolved that Count Guido Rangone should immediately set out on his March to Modena with Two Hundred light Horse, and Eight Hundred Foot, which in Conjunction with Seven Hundred Foot already in the Place, were thought more than sufficient to resist the Forces of Alfonso.

WHEN this Expedition was ordered there remained several Hours of Night, and Advice was received a little before that Lautrech was the preceding Evening encamped upon the Taro. But this Intelligence mixed Truth with Falshood, for it imported that the Swiss had the same Day

A. D. 1521. joined the French, which was false; nor was there any Notice that those Swiss who were in the French Army had not promised Lautrech after many and earnest Intreaties, to advance any farther than the Taro.

ference of the Generals. The Generals then being assembled on the other Occasion above related, and Daylight not yet appearing, and there being no Opportunity nor Necessity for them to engage themselves separately in any other Business, took Occasion to enter into Discourse, rather to pass away the Time, and not as debating in Council, on the State to which Affairs would probably be reduced by the Approach of Lautrech. In this free Conversation Prospero, the Marquis of Pescara, and Vitello had much Talk together on the Subject, the Result of which, it seems, was in Substance as follows: That it would be difficult to take Parma if a Battery were not also erected on the other Side of the City; for though the Wall which they had begun to batter the Day before should be opened, there remained no small Ascent from the Bed of the River to its Brink, nor could it be attempted without great Danger, because the Artillery and small Arms

Arms disposed on the three Bridges over ^{A. D.} the River and in the contiguous Houses ^{1521.} would gall the Assailants in Flank. It was said that the Neighbourhood of Lautrech, if he should come and encamp near them in some Place towards the Po, even though he should shun all Occasions of coming to a Battle, would yet render an Assault upon the Town extremely dangerous; and that it ought to be considered that many of the Foot were gone off with the Plunder they had taken in the Sack of the Codiponte, and that others were more intent on securing their Booty, than disposed to fight; and that their present Situation was attended with many Difficulties and Inconveniencies as well as Danger, because it would be necessary every Day to send out very numerous Escorts not only for Security of the Foragers, but also of the Money and Provisions, which daily arrived after fetching a very long Compass about the Walls of Parma; and it might happen that when these Troops were abroad the rest of the Forces in the Camp might be attacked at once by the French Army without, and by the Garrison within the Place. It was also alledged that if the Duke of Ferrara should augment his Forces it would be necessary to make further Detachments from the Camp for the Security of Modena and Reg- gio, and that by making Excursions only with those Troops which he had he would greatly distress their Convoys of Provisions, which would oblige them to raise the Siege, and this perhaps, when they were reduced to such Straits, could not be done without Danger. These Reasonings, which shewed an Inclination to raise the Siege, were not, however, urged in such a Manner that any one could be said to have discovered by his Discourse his Opinion or Advice for such a Step. At last, after a long Conversation on the Subject, the Marquis of Pescara, imagining that he had comprehended the Inclinations of the others, spake thus: “ I am sensible, says he, that we are all of the same Opinion, but each of us, advising only with himself, keeps Silence, expecting that another should make himself the Author of it, but I shall be under no Constraint in this Respect. My Opinion then is that our Stay about about Parma is attended with Danger, and no Hopes of Success, and that we have no Way to chuse but to break up and be gone as the lesser Evil." "The Marquis, says Prospero, has spoken no more than what I intended to say myself if he had not anticipated me." Vitello declared himself of the same Opinion. But as for Antonio da Leva he approved of their Removal from thence, but proposed to their Consideration whether it were not best for them to go and attack Lautrech. But to this it was replied, that the Enemy could not be forced to fight without great Difficulty, and to stay long there would be impossible, because the Difficulties which were considered as attendant on their remaining before Parma would become much greater; and it might easily happen for the Two Thousand Swiss to refuse to follow them, for, besides the Orders which they had many Days before received from the Cantons to quit the Service of the Pope, it was not probable that they could be disposed to fight against an Army in which were such Numbers of the same Nation; nor could it be denied that on account of

A. D. the Plunder made the Day before it was 1521. the more difficult to put the disordered Infantry in Motion. This Counsel therefore being rejected, the Generals seemed to be all unanimous for raising the Siege. But Prospero and Pescara withdrawing together in private, after a long Conference, asked the Commissary what he thought the Pope would say of them if they decamped from Parma: And the Commissary saying to the Marquis “ Why can’t we take Parma to-day, as ye assured me but last Evening?” the Marquis replied in Spanish, “ Neither to-day nor to-morrow, nor after to-morrow.” The Commissary then replied, that the Pope would doubtless be extremely disturbed at such a Step, because it would totally deprive him of Hopes of the Victory; but that the Point to be considered in this Resolution consisted in the Truth or Falseness of Facts taken by them for granted. For if their Continuance in the present Station were attended with Danger, and destitute of Hope, it would doubtless be highly imprudent not to remove; but if it should be found otherwise, their Decampment would vastly disorder and prejudice judice their Affairs. They would do well A. D.

 therefore to consider maturely the State of the Army, and the Importance of Things, and by weighing Hope with Danger discover which was greater. To this Admo-nition Prospero and the Marquis replying that all the Rules of War directed them to retire, the Commissary would not presume to set himself in Oppposition to Generals of such great Authority, and so it was resolved to decamp the same Day, and the Artillery was immediately drawn off from the Wall. But as soon as this Resolution was published through the Camp, it was blamed as proceeding from too much Timidity by all those who had not assisted at the Debate; so that the Commissary and Morone joining their Heads together endeavoured to remove Prospero from this Determination, who did not shew himself averse from taking the Affair under a second Consideration, on the contrary saying, in very laudable Words, and the more to be valued in proportion to the Dignity and Wisdom of the Speaker, that he was not so disposed by Nature as to be ashamed to change his Opinion when better

A. D. better Reasons were offered him, he then 1521.

summoned together again the same Persons who had been present at passing the Resolution. But the Marquis of Pescara being busied in removing the Artillery, and abhorring to alter the first Conclusion, refused to come, so that the Affair remaining perplexed rather than resolved, every one retired, and set about executing what had at first been determined.

Siege of
raised.

THUS on the same Day, which was the Twelfth of the Siege, the Army returned to their Camp at San Lazaro, not without Danger of a very great Disorder in their Decampment; for the German Foot, demanding such unreasonable Conditions in Relation to their Pay that they could not be granted, refused to follow the Army, and having broken their old Officers had created for their General one of themselves, the Author of this Sedition, and it was feared that they would make an Agreement with the French; at last however after the Army was departed, contrary to all Expectation, they changed their Minds, and followed the rest of the Troops.

Troops. In a State of such Confusion, A. D. while the Army was full of Terror from ^{1521.} so sudden a Decampment, and by the Tumult of the Germans, it is not doubted that if Lautrech had come upon them unexpectedly, he might very easily have put them to Flight.

THIS Resolution wonderfully afflicted the Pope, who expected to hear that his Troops had entered Parma, and now thought himself unaccountably and contrary to all Reason deprived of all Hopes of Victory. He found himself embarked on a very deep Sea, and ready to sink under a very heavy Load, for except the Men at Arms and the Spanish Infantry, the whole Expence of the War in general was supported by himself, and, what was worse, he was in Suspicion of the Faith of the Cæsarean Generals. Many others also concurred with him in his Suspicions, persuading themselves that the Raising the Siege of Parma was not occasioned by Fear, but owing to Artifice and a Jealously which those Commanders had conceived that the Pontiff, as soon as he had ons on the Conduct of that Enterprize

A. D. recovered Parma and Piacenza, which 1521.

was all that appertained to him of the State of Milan, would grow cool and remiss in the Prosecution of the War, and no longer chuse to be at such vast Expences and Trouble for the Interests of others. And what gave the Pontiff just Cause of Suspicion was his knowing how slowly the Army had proceeded to lay Siege to Parma, which was at length opened and carried on in a wrong Place; that after they had taken the lesser Part of the Town, they had studiously raised the same Difficulties in taking the other; he had observed their slow and dilatory Manner of managing the Siege, as if it were done on Purpose to give Time to the French to come and relieve the Place; and lastly, that when they were in Possession of Part of the Town, at the bare Name of Lautrech, tho' with an inferior Army, they had shamefully abandoned it. Some there were who doubted that, without the Knowledge of Prospero, the whole Management was directed by the Contrivance of the Marquis of Pescara out of Envy to the other's Glory, and a Design sign to do all that lay in his Power to A. D. lessen it. But perhaps after all the Truth 1521. lay on the Side of those who believed that the whole Affair had been conducted with Sincerity, and that the Generals had no other Motive for their Retreat than the Fear they had conceived from the Approach of Lautrech, being in a great measure deceived by their first Advices of his Force, which magnified it much beyond what was true. Certain it is that the French Generals were most of all amazed at this Step, for they had very small Hopes of preserving Parma, since the Swiss, regulating their Conduct rather according to their own Nature than in compliance with the Necessities of those who paid them, advanced forwards with a very slow Pace. Wherefore many of them did not ascribe the Departure of the Enemy to Fear, but, by another Construction, imagined rather that Prospero, as a very experienced General, knowing the great Disorders into which Armies are thrown by the Saccage of Cities, and considering that it would be very difficult to prevent the Soldiers from plundering Parma,

A. D. Parma, had judged it very dangerous to 1521. take the Place in so near a Neighbourhood of the Enemy.

 Armies.

W H A T E V E R was the true Cause of this Event, Lautrech, after providing Parma with fresh Troops, encamped at Fontanella, from whence three Days after he sent a Detachment to take Roccabianca, a Castle in the Parmesan near the Po, which after standing a Battery for some Time was, in Despair of Relief, together with the Town surrendered by Orlando Palavicino, Lord of the Place, on condition of freely marching away. The Army after this extended itself between San Secondo and the Faro with a Design to regulate its Motions according to the Progress of the Enemy, being greatly encouraged, partly by the Defence of Parma, and partly by the Arrival of a new Body of Swiss at Cremona. The Coming of these Troops, tho', by Orders from Lautrech, they had halted at Cremona, was the Cause that the Enemies Army not thinking themselves safe in their Camp at San Lazzaro, retired to the River Lenza

on

on the Side towards Reggio, with an Intention to remove to a greater Distance if the French advanced forwards, and they would have retreated much farther without so much as expecting the Motions of Lautrech, if the Complaints of the Pontiff and of Cæsar's Agents, and the Disgrace which they had sensibly incurred with the whole Army had not retained them. In these Stations the Armies continued for many Days, Lautrech however very frequently sending out his Horse and the Garrison of Parma, who made Incursions by the Way of the Mountains as far as Reggio, with no small Molestation to the Convoys of Provisions with which the Enemy's Camp was supplied from Reggio, and not much to the Commendation of Prospero, who was by Nature very slow in giving Orders for Excursions of the light Horse, or for making any other Movement how small soever.

THE Affairs of Cæsar beyond the Meziers Mountains were attended with no better ^{besieged} Success; for after he had entered the ^{in vain by} Cæsar. Dominions of the King of France on the

BUT in Italy the Projects of War had suffered no Interruption from the ill Success; for the Enemies of the French resolving to concern themselves no more about the Acquisition of Parma or any other Towns, determined to penetrate further into the Dutchy of Milan, by help of an Augmentation of their Forces with Italian Foot to the Number of Six Thousand, which they were continually listing. And they were encouraged to proceed with the greater Boldness to this Resolution, from the Hopes of a new Descent of Twelve Thousand Swiss in the Pay of the Pontiff. These Troops the Cardinal of Sion, who openly acted as Sollicitor in the Diets against the French, Ennio Bishop of Veruli, who was the Apostolic Nuncio, and the Ambassadors of

of Cæſar, had at firſt reſuſed, becauſe they were to be hired only for the Defence of the State of the Church, and with expreſs Orders not to act offeſſively againſt the Dominions of the King of France, but at laſt accepted of them on theſe Conditions, ſince they were not to be obtained otherwiſe, in Hopes that ſoon after their Deſcent into Italy, by means of their Avarice and Inconſtancy, and by corrupting and otherwiſe tampering with their Leaders, they might be induced to act with the Army againſt the Dutchy of Milan. Nor in this Reſolution to advance forwards was there much Occaſion for doubting to which Quarter they ſhould direct their Courſe; for in continuing the War on this Side the River Po there manifeſtly appeared very great Difficulties. There were no Hopes of taking Parma, and if they left that City behind them it would be neceſſary to go and attack the Enemy, an Attempt evidently pernicious, ſince they were encamped in a ſtrong Place, and their Camp was defended with a numerous Artillery, properly diſpoſed. Parma and the Enemy's Army, or to proceed further without fighting, was by no means advisable, for by keeping their Station between the Enemy's Camp and these Towns in their Possession, they would in a very few Days be distressed for Want of Provisions, which could not be procured from the hostile Country, nor conveyed from any great Distance. These Difficulties would be avoided by transferring the War beyond the Po, for in that Country, naturally plentiful, and not damaged by the Wars, they might be confident of finding Plenty of Victuals; and they would meet with no Obstacle till they came to the Adda, for leaving Cremona on the left, and advancing to the Oglio, they would light on no Towns capable of making Resistance. They were persuaded also that the Venetian Senate would not expose their own Troops to the Fortune of a Battle for the Interests of others, and believed that the French would not venture to oppose them but at the Passage of the Adda; and, what is more, many were in Hopes that when the Army approached the Borders of the Venetians, was made of many Necessaries for this new Resolution, as Artillery, Ammunition, which he had about him, marched against the Mountain of Modena, which, while Modena was subject to Cæsar, and after-the Church, had never acknowledged any

 But when the Inhabitants of the Mountain

AT the same time Bonifacio Bishop of Alessandria, Son of the late Francesco Bernardino Visconti, fled from Milan, on the Discovery of a Plot which had been carrying on against the French. There came to Light also another Plot in Cremona under the Management of Niccolo Varolo, one of the principal Exiles of that City, for which some Cremonese who were privy to it suffered due Punishment. Nor do I know which at this Time was greater, either the ill Fortune, or the Temerity and Imprudence of the Exiles of the Dutchy of Milan, who were very numerous in the Army, for they were not only unsuccessful in all their Undertakings, but while they were intent on plundering the whole Country, they obstructed the Conveyance of Provisions, without making Amends for all the Mischief they did (I always except Morone) by an extraordinary Diligence, or with an Intelligence of Spies; nay, when Prospero had long before ordered them out towards Piacenza, after doing vast Damages PROSPERO at this Time made an Attempt to burn the Boats of the French Bridge, which was brought up and laid over the River near Cremona, and was but slenderly guarded, that he might gain the more Time for proceeding forwards while Lautrech was employed in collecting of Boats necessary for refitting the Bridge. But it happened from the Length of the Way that Giovanni de' Medici, who was order'd for that Purpose with Two Hundred light Horse, and Three Hundred Spanish Foot, could not arrive at the Place before Daylight, so that the Watermen being alarmed by the Cries of the Peasants drew off the Boats into the Middle of the Po, secure of being molested by the Enemy posted on the Bank.

marched by Bresselle, where a Bridge of Boats had been laid; but before they passed, as a Necessity of thinking on Self-Defence is inseparable from Designs of acting offensively against others, Vitello Vitelli with an Hundred and Fifty Men at Arms, as many light Horse, and Two Thousand Foot on the Florentine Establishment, was detached to take care of the Towns of the Church which they left behind. Thither also repaired the Bishop of Pistoia with the Two Thousand Swiss, for it was not thought safe to lead them against the French, who had in their Service so many Troops of the same Nation granted them by Decree, and with the public Banners; and the rather because they were as yet uncertain of the Resolution of the new Swiss, who were assembled at Coira, and certain Advice was expected every Hour that they had put themselves in Motion. The Bishop and Vitello had it in Charge not only to defend Modena and the other Towns of the Church from any Attempts that might be made upon them, but also to act offensively against the Duke of Ferrara, who assuming to himself the Glory of

of delivering Parma had seized on Finale A. D. and San Felice, but proceeded no further, 1521. because the Pope, whose Hatred was increased by this Insult, prosecuted him with Censures and Ecclesiastical Monitories, so far as to deprive him of the Dutchy of Ferrara.

THE Army passed the Po on the First of October, and went and encamped at Passes the Casal Maggiore, having spent in passing Po not only the whole Day but good Part of the following Night, occasioned by the incredible Multitude of useless Attendants, and the vast Baggage, the Generals being greatly deceived in their Judgment, who had persuaded themselves that the whole Army with all that belonged to it would be passed by Noon. Through the Weariness of the hindmost, and the Darknes of the Night, Part of the Artillery, great Quantities of Ammunition, and a very considerable Number of Soldiers halted, and remained during the Night dispersed between the Po and Casal Maggiore, exposed a Prey to any small Number of the Enemy which should happen to attack them. And it

A. D. it was not doubted that if Lautrech, who 1521. had assembled all the Swiss, and came to encamp at Colorno on the same Day that his Adversaries encamped at Bresselle, had on the Day in which they passed marched his Army over his Bridge to Casal Maggiore distant three Miles from Colorno, or, as Colorno is but six Miles distant from Bresselle, had at Noon attacked that Part of the Army which had not passed the River, he would have obtained some signal Advantage. But infinite Opportunities are lost in Wars, because Generals are not always apprised of the Disorders and Difficulties that befall the Enemy.

Pope's
 Legate arrives at the Camp.

AT Casal Maggiore arrived the same Night the Cardinal de' Medici with the Pope's Commission as Legate of the Army.
 For though his Holiness had already, but very secretly, begun to lend an Ear to the Ambassador of the King of France, yet fearing that the ill Success, and the leaving upon him in a manner the whole Burden of the War, might give Cause to Cæsar, or to his Ministers to suspect that, in order to extricate himself from so many Difficulties

culties and Dangers, he might turn his ^{A. D.} Mind on forming new Schemes and taking ^{1521.} other Measures, he imagined that nothing could render them so secure of his Intentions, and of Consequence induce them to pursue the War with the greater Ardor, as the Presence of a Cardinal, whose Person, both on account of his being the next Relation by Blood to the Pontiff, and because, though his constant Residence was in Florence, no Business of Importance belonging to the Pontificate was dispatched without his Participation, carried with it in a manner the very same Authority as the Person of the Pontiff himself. His Presence also was of Service for supporting the declined Reputation of the Enterprize, and the Awe of so great a Personage mightily contributed to procure a greater Unanimity in the Counsels and Resolutions of the Generals, For the Disagreement between Prospero Colonna and the Marquis of Pescara became every Day more evident, and was increased not only on other Accounts, but because the Marquis, after raising the Siege of Parma, desirous of transferring the Infamy of that Resolution from himself

on

on others, had written to Rome that it had been resolved to decamp without his Advice or Knowledge.

Progress
Army.

FROM Casal Maggiore, after resting a Day, the Army put itself on its March through the Cremonese for the Bank of the River Oglio, on which it arrived in four Encampments, without meeting in the mean time with any Accident of Moment, except that while they took up their Quarters at a Country Place called la Corte de' Frati a very great Quarrel arose between the Spanish and Italian Foot, in which the Spaniards, rather by knowing how to use the Opportunity presented them by the Occasion, than by Valour, killed many of the others; but the Fray was soon extinguished by the Diligence and Authority of the Generals: And the Day before Giovanni de' Medici making an Excursion towards the Enemy, who had passed the Po higher up towards Cremona on the same Day that the others had posted themselves at Casal Maggiore, routed the Venetian Stradiotti commanded by Mercurio, in whose Company were also some French Horse,

among whom was taken Prisoner Don A. D.
Luigi Gaetano Son of the Duke of Trajetto, ^{1521.} tho' his State was in the Possession of Prospero Colonna.

BUT while the Army encamped on the River Oglio, Fortune, casting her Smiles on the Cause of the Pontiff and Cæsar, defeated the unlucky Counsel of the Generals, who had resolved to march from Corte de' Frati, and to encamp with the Army at the Village of Bordellano at the Distance only of eight Miles on the same River. But as it was impracticable, on account of the Difficulty of the Road, to convey thither the Artillery, it was necessary to halt half way, at the Town of Rebecca, divided from Pontevico, a Town of the Venetians, only by the River Oglio. While they were encamped in this Place they received Intelligence that Lautrech, followed by the Venetian Troops, having left his heavy Baggage at Cremona, was arrived the same Day at San Martino five Miles distant from them, resolved if the Enemies proceeded forwards to engage them the next Day in the Field. These Advices mightily mightily disturbed the Minds of the Cardinal de' Medici and the Generals, because the Venetian Senate when they joined their Troops to the Army of Lautrech had signified this their Resolution to the Pope in such Terms as if they seemed not to put themselves in Motion from a Desire that the King of France should get the Victory, but that he might have no just Cause to charge them with not observing the Confederacy: Whence they at first perswaded themselves, and the Coming of the Cardinal had confirmed them in the Opinion, that Andrea Gritti had received secret Orders not to permit those Troops to fight: As this Supposition now appeared false it was necessary for them to depart from their first Resolution, because none could deny that the Enemy's Army was superior in Force, for it was very strong in Cavalry, and its Infantry consisted of Seven Thousand French and Italians and Ten Thousand Swiss. But in the Army of the Pontiff and Cæsar, the Number of Germans was so greatly diminished, and in some measure that of the Spaniards, that they hardly amounted to the Number of Seven Thousand,

Thousand, and as to the Six Thousand Italians, because they were for the most Part but new Levies, they were more considerable for their Number than their Goodness.

IT was the Resolution therefore of Prospero and the other Commanders to wait in that Place for the Coming of the Swiss, who, as they were already in Motion, and because the Cardinal of Sion, who was their Leader, had sent Advice that they should make no Stop in any Place, were expected to arrive in three or four Days at farthest. The next Morning therefore they reduced their Camp, which had been pitched in a kind of Hurry the Evening before, into a better Form, giving themselves no Concern that it might be sorely annoyed by the Artillery of the opposite Town of Pontevico, because the Cardinal de' Medici, conformably to his first Notions, had assured himself that the Venetians, who were under no other Obligations to the King of France than to grant him Troops for the Defence of the Dutchy of Milan, would never consent that the

A. D. 1521. Army of the Church and Cæsar should receive any Molestation from their Towns.

To the Resolution of waiting for the Swiss at Rebecca manifestly presented itself in Opposition the Difficulty of supplying the Camp with Provisions, since those which were brought along with the Army could not be sufficient for many Days; and from the Terror of the Ravages committed especially by the Milaneſe Exiles, and the general Flight of the Peasants, the fresh Supplies arrived but in very small Quantities, and even those continually diminished.

Advice of
dini.

Wherefore the Commissary Guicciardini had represented that as it was impossible for them to support themselves in that Place for Want of Victuals, and that the Arrival of the Swiss might happen from many Causes to be delayed, it would perhaps be more to their Advantage to remain no longer in their present Situation, but to retire five or six Miles back along the same River to the Borders of the Mantouan, where having behind them a friendly Country they could never fail of Provisions; visions; and that this Motion, which at present might be made with Security, would by the Approach of the Enemy perhaps become impracticable without very great Danger. This Advice would have relished well enough with the Generals, had not the Disgrace, so fresh in Memory, of their Retreat from Parma restrained every one from speaking his Mind freely. They were also under some Influence from their Hopes of the speedy Arrival of the Swiss, who might make their Descent in five or six Days from Coira into the Territory of Bergamo, whence they had a very short March to take for joining the Army. It being thus determined to wait their Arrival at Rebecca, Provision of Meal which had been brought with the Army was distributed by Measure to every Company in the Camp. And as there were no portable Ovens in the Army, and the Houses that had Ovens were taken up with quartering Soldiers, every Man baked for himself what fell to his Share upon hot Coals; which Inconvenience, considering also that the Meal was but sparingly distributed, was the Occasion that many of

trech.

BUT on the third Day Lautrech, who had posted himself at Bordellano, sent Part of his Artillery, which had passed the River at Noon, to Pontevico, with the Consent of the Venetian Proveditor, tho' he pretended the contrary, and on the same Day, though it was near Night, began to fire on the Enemy's Camp; which so alarmed their Generals, that finding themselves in most manifest Danger, tho' they might have removed to a Place under Covert of some little Hills, yet being terrified by the Want of Provisions, and their Fears increased by the Slowness of the Swiss, the next Morning before Break of Day they broke up in great Silence without Sound of Drum or Trumpet, and putting the Carriages before the Troops, proceeded in very good Order, alike prepared to march or to fight, till they arrived at Gabbioneta, a Town five Miles distant on the Borders of the Mantouan, where they encamped, all acknowledging that they had escaped a very great Danger, partly partly by the Kindness of Fortune, and partly through the Imprudence of the Enemy. For it is certain that if they had not stopped at Rebecca on the Day they had appointed to go to Bordellano, they would have had little or no Hopes of saving themselves. For the same or greater Necessities would have constrained them to retire, and the Retreat being longer, and from an Enemy at a nearer Distance, must have been extremely hazardous. It is no less certain also that Lautrech would have obtained an undoubted Victory if, on the same Day that he sent his Artillery to Pontevico, he had gone, as many, and among others the Swiss Officers, advised him, and posted himself near the Enemy, who, on account of his Vicinity, would have found it impracticable to remove with Security, since they would have been prevented, especially by the Annoyance which they must receive by the Cannon of Pontevico, from ranging themselves in Order. Nor was it possible for them to remain above three or four Days in the Place where they had posted themselves without perishing with Hunger. But while, according to his own Nature, he despised the Counsels of all others, and first gave Warning to the Enemies of the imminent Danger that threatened them, he gave them a fair Opportunity to prevent the Execution of his Menaces by a sudden Departure. It was not therefore without Reason that the Swiss Officers, after surveying the Situation of the Place, said to Lautrech, who had made a Motion to approach the Enemy, and finding them gone was come to encamp at Rebecca, that they deserved the Pay which is given to conquering Soldiers after winning a Battle, because it was none of their Fault that he had not obtained a Victory.

AT Gabbioneta the Army of the League rested many Days in a Camp excellently fortified ; but as the Generals saw that the Arrival of the Swiss was continually prolonged, and were under Apprehensions from the Vicinity of the French Army, which was much stronger than their own, and threatened to attack them, they passed the Oglio, and went and encamped at Ostiano, a Castle of Federigo da Bozzolo, with an Intention not to leave that Post till the Arrival of the Swiss. This Resolution, which was prudently taken, was also accompanied with Fortune, for the Army would have received great Damage in the Camp at Gabbioneta, by the very low Situation of the Place, and the heavy Rains which fell immediately after the Decampment.

BUT while the Armies lay thus idle within their Trenches, one at Osliano, and the other at Rebecca, the Bishop of Pistoia and Vitello with a Body of Swiss and Italian Foot attacked the Troops of the Duke of Ferrara in their Entrenchments at Finale, and tho' they were posted in a Place strong by Nature, and well fortified by Art, yet the Swiss advancing with the greatest Fierceness to meet the Danger, routed and put them to Flight, with the Loss of many killed on the Spot, and among them, bravely fighting, the Chevalier Cavriana. The Duke of Ferrara, who was at Bondino, was so greatly terrified at this Defeat, that he immediately abandoned that Castle, and fled to Ferrara,

A. D. 1521. rara, using the same Expedition in drawing off the Boats over which he had laid a Bridge at the same Place, that his Enemies might not be able to follow him.

Swiss descend into Italy. IN the mean time the Swiss were descended into the Territory of Bergamo, but were so full of Diffensions, and raised so many Difficulties, as retarded their Progress, having expressly refused to turn their Course for attacking the Dutchy of Milan, in Compliance with the earnest Sollicitations of the Cardinal of Sion, and of the Agents of the Pontiff and Cæsar. They even made some Difficulty of marching to join the Army which expected them at Ostiano, because it was prepared to proceed offensively against the King of France, offering to march to any Place which the Pope should think fit in the State of the Church, for whose Defence they had enter'd into Pay; and yet, according to the barbarous Construction which they frequently put upon Things, consenting to march and attack Parma and Piacenza, as Cities manifestly appertaining to the Church, or at least to which the King of France had

no clear Right and Title. They demanded also, before they would put themselves in Motion, a Detachment of Three Hundred light Horse from the Army, to assist them in collecting Supplies of Provisions in the Country through which they were to pass.
 At last on the Arrival of these Horse, which had made their Way through the Venetian Territories with all the Suddenness and Speed imaginable, they set out on their March, directing their Course to some Place in the Neighbourhood of the Army, where they might with the more Convenience consult together and resolve on their future Operations, having by the Way put to Flight some French and Ve- netian Troops; which had posted themselves at Pontoglio or the Lake of Eupilo in order to prevent their Passage: As soon as they were approached near the Army Instances began to be made to dispose them to join with the rest against the French, repeated Messâges and Embassies passing to and fro, and the Archbishop of Capua, by Commission of the Cardinal de' Medici, repairing to their Camp on that Affair. At last those of the Canton of

A. D.

A. D. Zurich, who, as they have greater Authority, make a Profession of deporting themselves with greater Gravity, persisted in their Refusal; the others, after much Boggling and Suspense, neither expressly refused nor accepted the Demand, not denying their Consent to follow the Army, but without declaring themselves ready to march after it into the Dutchy of Milan. In this Case, by Advice of the Cardinal of Sion, and the Swiss Officers, whose Assent had been gained by a Multitude of Promises, it was resolved to proceed forwards in Hopes that since these Troops had not refused to follow them, it might not be difficult to lead them into any Place wherever the Army went.

THUS the Zurichese, in Number Four Thousand, turning their March towards Reggio, the Army, after about a Month's Station at Gabbioneta and Ostiano, joined the other Swiss at Gambera, and set forwards, the two Legates, Sion and Medici, marching in the midst with silver Crosses, and, so great is the Abuse in our Times of the Reverence due to Religion! surrounded, surrounded, amidst an Infinity of Arms and Artillery, with Blasphemers, Murderers and Robbers. In three Marches through the Territory of the Venetians they arrived at Orci Vecchi a Castle of the Republic, excusing their Passage to the Senate as occasioned by Necessity, and not from a Desire to give them Offence, in the same Manner as the Senate had before excused themselves by alledging that Andrea Gritti their Proveditor had been forced to consent that Lautrech should send Artillery to Pontevico. At Orci Vecchi arrived Expresses sent by the Lords of the Cantons to command the Swiss to leave the Army, and the like Orders were sent by other Expresses to those who were in the French Camp, representing that it was a Dishonour to their Name that their Troops should serve in two hostile Armies under the public Banners. But these Orders had different Effects; for the Expresses which were coming to the Camp of the League were purposely detained on the Road, and never came to the Swiss who were with Sion, but all those in the French Service quitted it in a manner without any Warning,

Reflexions on bad Ministers.

HENCE we might justly take Occasion to reflect on the mighty Influence of the Malignity and Imprudence of Ministers on the Affairs of such Princes as, either thro' Indolence neglect the public Business, or from Want of Parts are of themselves incapable of discerning good Counsels from bad: For Three Hundred Thousand Ducats being provided, in order to be sent to Lautrech according to the Promises made to that General, the Lady Regent, Mother of the King, sacrificing her Son's Profit to her Jealousy of Lautrech's Greatness, took care that the Administrators of the Finances should, without the King's Knowledge, convert that Sum of Money to other Uses.

LAUTRECH

LAUTRECH therefore much perplexed in Mind, and under deep Concern, because, by the Departure of the Swiss, the Success of the War, which before was like to be happy, was now become very dubious, leaving Garrisons in Cremona and Pizzichitone, assembled the rest of his Army at Cassano, in Hopes to prevent the Enemy from passing the Adda, as well on Account of the other Difficulties that attend an Army in the Passage of Rivers against an Enemy posted on the opposite Bank, as because in that Place the Bank of the River towards Milan raises itself to a more than ordinary Height, from whence he could do more Execution with his Cannon upon the Enemy, than he could receive Damage from their Batteries.

trech.

ON the other Side the Apostolic Legates and Generals decamped from Orci Vecchi, and again passing the Oglio arrived in three Marches at Rivolta, without feeling any more a Want of Provisions, because the Towns of the Ghiaradadda, which were abandoned by the French, supplied

A. D.

At this Place while the Armies were intent, one on gaining and the other on defending the Passage of the River, Prospero and the other Generals prepared to lay a Bridge between Rivolta and Cassano, a very difficult and hazardous Undertaking because of the Opposition of the Enemy. After spending two or three Days in Delays and Consultations, at last Prospero, without communicating his Design to the Marquis of Pescara, that he might have none to share with him in the Glory of the Action, and refusing the Service of the Spaniards because it should not come to his Knowledge, caused two small Barks to be privately taken out of the River Brembo, on board which he ordered some Companies of Italian Foot to pass the River Adda with all possible Silence in the Night over against the Town of Vauri, which is an open unwall'd Place situated on the Bank of the Adda five Miles from Cassano, where there is a Conveniency of passing the River, and in the midst of the Town is a small Circuit of Walls, which serves for a Fort. This Place was guarded by a few Horse commanded manded by Ugo de Peppoli, Lieutenant of A. D. a Company of Lances conferred by the 1521.

 King of France on Ottaviano Fregoso. Ugo hearing the Noise hasted to encounter the Enemy on the Bank, but was easily repulsed by the Fire of the Musquets.
 But it is believed that he might with Ease have defended himself, if the Horse which he had with him had been supported by a Number of Musqueteers, which, as he affirmed, he had demanded of Lautrech.
 The Foot, as they passed the River, drew up on an Eminence in the Town, which has a small Kind of Fort as beforementioned, expecting the Succours that had been appointed by Prospero, who, on the first Notice of this happy Beginning, immediately turned that Way almost all the Foot of the Army that were quartered in the little Towns of the Ghiaradadda, with Orders that those who first arrived, and afterwards others, successively, should without Delay pass the River in the same Barks, and in two others of those which were carried in the Army for the Convenience of laying a Bridge over Rivers, and the same Bank : And Prospero himself and the other Generals, with the Cardinal de Medici in all Haste took the same Way, leaving Orders at Rivolta that if the French left their Station, a Bridge should immediately be laid. But at Vauri the Success of the Enterprize was still for some Hours uncertain ; for if Lautrech, on the first Notice of the Enemies, had immediately detached thither a Part of his Army, it is not doubted but he would have oppressed them* ; but after he had stood for several Hours in Suspense, and uncertain what Measures to take, he detached L'Escud with Four Hundred Lances and the French Infantry, followed by some Pieces of Artillery. These Troops marched with all Speed, and arriving immediately made a vigorous Attack on the Place where the Enemies were retired in Sight of those on the opposite Bank who were coming to their Relief, the Hopes of which encouraged them to make a stout Defence, tho'

L'Escud

* Peppoli had sent to demand Succours of Lautrech, who happened to be asleep in his Chamber, and his Attendants unwilling that their Master should be disturbed, would not suffer the Messenger to enter the Room. Giov.

L'Escud with his Men at Arms dismounting on Foot fought most valiantly in the narrow Ways, and it is not doubted that, if the Cannon had arrived in Season, he would have conquered them. In the mean time wonderful was the Hurry on the opposite Bank, where Tegane, Commander of the Grifons, and two Spanish Ensigns of Foot, animated by the moving Speeches of the Cardinal de' Medici and the Generals, were continually pressing to be foremost in passing the River as many together as the Barks would hold at a time. But Giovanni de' Medici, encouraged by none, but only stimulated by his own Magnanimity, and ardent Thirst after Glory, passed the River mounted on a Turkish Horse, which the Deepness of the Water obliged him to swim till he reached the opposite Shore, at the same time striking Terror into his Enemies, and giving Encouragement to his Friends. At last L'Escud, though his Artillery was just arrived, despairing of Victory, with the Loss of an Ensign, retired to Cassano, from whence Lautrech retreated with his whole Army to Milan. When he was arrived

 Hatred he had before conceived, or with an Intent to strike a Terror into the Minds of the People by so tragical a Spectacle, he caused Cristofano Palavicino to be publicly beheaded. A Sight truly lamentable, whether you regard the Nobility of the Family, the Greatness of the Person, or his Age, and that he had been Event.

THE Passage of the Adda exalted to the Skies the Name of Prospero, who before, by his Retreat from Parma, and the Slowness of his Proceedings, had lost all his Reputation in Rome and in the Army. But as the Memory of former Actions is frequently obliterated by the last, every Mouth was now full of his Praises, celebrating him as the Man who, without Blood, and without Danger, but wholly by Policy and Industry, worthy of the most expert General, had stolen from the Enemy a Passage over that River which Lautrech had promised himself to prevent,

prevent, with such an Assurance that, ^{A. D.} besides what he said of it in public, he had ^{1521.} written to the King that he would absolutely hinder it. There were not wanting some however who with Reasons, either real or apparent, endeavoured to extenuate the Glory of this Action, alledging that it shewed no extraordinary Parts or Industry either in the Invention or Execution, because Nature of itself teaches every one who meets with Opposition at Rivers or narrow Passes to seek a Passage either above or below where there is none to hinder him; that the Pass of Vauri lay near, was very convenient, and a Pass ordinarily frequented, and that Lautrech had been so neglectful to guard it that his Negligence had left no Room for Industry. And upon what other Account is Prospero to be commended for his provident Care and Foresight, besides his privately procuring the Boats, and managing the Affair with the necessary Silence and Secresy? Others who are perhaps too exact Judges of Matters, and more ready to condemn dubious Errors than to commend certain Success, not content with diminishing the Fame of his Industry have censured him for not taking due Precautions, and observing convenient Order, because he had sent no Orders to the Troops that were quartered in Trevi, Caravaggio, and divers other Places, and designed for Succours, to put themselves in Motion before he had Notice that the Foot he had sent forwards had taken Possession of Vauri, by which means it was the Middle of the Day before the foremost of them could possibly arrive on the Bank of the River, and above fourteen Hours after the first Detachment had passed ; whence it was not doubted that if Lautrech, at the first Notice, had acted as he did many Hours afterwards, he would have recovered Vauri, and defeated the Troops that were passed, because the Forces appointed to support them would have arrived too late. But these Constructions did not fully the Glory of Prospero, for the Public usually judges of Things by the Event, sometimes praising sometimes condemning as the Success happens to be prosperous or adverse, and always ascribing to Counsel and Design what is often owing merely to Fortune.

LAUTRECH being retired from the Bank of the Adda, every one expected that the Enemy, who the next Day laid a Bridge between Rivolta and Cassano, would as soon as possible approach Milan; but Prospero, whose Connfel, tho' generally blamed by the Vulgar, was approved by the Skilful in the military Art, chose rather the first Day to march by a longer Way about, and to take up his Quarters at Marignano, a Town halfway between Milan and Pavia; for it being impossible to encamp in the open Field, on account of the Season, which was come in cold and very rainy, he thought it more convenient to approach Milan on that Side, from which, if he found it difficult, as he imagined it would be, to gain an Entrance into the Place, he might immediately turn his March for Pavia, where Lautrech, in order to draw all his Forces to Milan, had left no Garrison, that he might fix the Seat of the War in that plentiful and very commodious City. On the other Side, Lautrech, whose Foot were reduced to a small Number, was inclined at first to defend only the City of Milan; but afterwards considering that if he abandoned the Suburbs he should give the Enemy an Opportunity to lodge themselves there, and by that means carry on the Siege at their own Leisure, he resolved to guard also the Suburbs: A Resolution certainly full of Fortitude and Prudence, if it had been accompanied with due Vigilance, and by means of which, considering the sudden Accidents which happened but a very few Days after, Affairs would have taken a very different Turn from what happened.

BUT the Army of the League, the greater Part of which was quartered at Marignano, and the Swiss more advanced at the Abby of Chiaravalle, having rested three Days in expectation of the Artillery, which the Difficulty of the Roads had rendered impossible to keep Pace with the Army, directed its March to Milan, with an Intention, if it did not gain an Entrance the same Day, to depart the next for Pavia, whither Part of the light Horse had been already detached to take Possession.

Possession. And it happened that Morning, which is very remarkable, that while the Legates and the principal Officers of the Army stopped in a Meadow near Chiaravalle, to give Room for the Swiss to march, they were addressed by a venerable old Man, in a Plebeian Dress, who declared that he was sent by the Inhabitants of the Parish of San Siro in Milan, and conjured them with great Earnestness to march forwards, because it had been appointed that not only the Inhabitants of that Parish, but all the People of Milan, should at the first Approach of the Army, at the Sound of the Bells in all the Parishes, rise up in Arms against the French. And this Adventure appeared afterwards the more surprising because after the most diligent Search that could be made to find the Man again, it could never be known who he was, nor from whom he had been sent.

A remarkable Adventure.

THE Army then marched in Order of Battle towards the Roman Gate, the heavy Artillery stopping at the Head of a Way that turns towards Pavia; and the Spanish

Night the Foss between the Roman Gate and the Gate of Pavia, and the Musqueteers presenting themselves before a Bastion erected in a Place called the Vicentino, near the Gate named Lodovica, more with Design of making a Tryal, than in Hopes of obtaining any Advantage, the Venetian Troops, which had the Guard of that Post, not daring so much as to look the Enemy in the Face, with the most shameful Cowardice turned their Backs, and betook themselves to Flight, and the Swiss who were posted near them behaved in the same Manner, so that the Spanish Foot passed the Ditch and the Rampart without Difficulty, taking Prisoner as they passed Teodoro da Trivulzi, who on the first Alarm had posted thither unarmed on a Mule, and received a slight Wound; he afterwards paid the Marquis of Pescara Twenty Thousand Ducats for his Ransom. Andrea Gritti with much Difficulty saved himself, and joining the French in their Flight they all retired together, fetching a long Compass, into the City,

City, where having made no Provisions ^{A. D.} for Defence, and having but very few ^{1521.} Foot, and the Hearts of the People disposed to Rebellion, they made a Halt about the Castle. On the other Hand the Marquis of Pescara, intent on following his good Fortune, approaching the Roman Gate (the Gates of the City and those of the Suburbs are called by the same Names) was by the Chiefs of the Ghibelline Faction, who had seized on that Gate, admitted into the Place, and a little after entered after the same Manner, by the Gate of the Tesino, the Cardinal de' Medici, the Marquis of Mantoua, and Prospero, with a Part of the Army, the Conquerors themselves wondering by what Means, and through what Disorder they had obtained so easy and important a Victory. But the principal Cause proceeded from the Negligence of the French, for Lautrech, by what appeared afterwards, had not only no Intelligence that the Army had moved that Day, but it is believed that the vast Damages done to the Roads by the excessive Rains had rendered him secure, as making it impracticable cable for the Enemy on that Day to move their Artillery, without which he did not imagine they would venture to attack the Ramparts. Hence at that very Time when the Enemy was entering the Gates, he was taking his Diversion with some of his Officers on Horseback, and riding through the Streets of Milan unarmed; and L'Escud, fatigued and spent with Watching the Night before, was asleep in his own Quarters. It is believed however that after the French General had assembled the flying Troops on the Plain before the Castle he might have had a fair Opportunity of attacking the Enemy, Part of whom were quartered after a very disorderly Manner in Milan, Part of them remained in the Suburbs in the same Disorder, and the rest were encamped without the Town after a scattering and confused Rate. But Fear and the Mistakes occasioned by the Darkeness of the Night preventing him from discerning in so short a Time the Posture of the Enemy, he went off the same Night with the whole Army to Como. Here he left Fifty Men at Arms, and Six Hundred Foot, and then taking by that City. The same Inclination was in the City of Cremona, where News being just before received not only of the Revolution in Milan, but also that the French Army was defeated, the People rose in Arms, and began to cry up the Name of the Empire and of the Duke of Milan. Lautrech, who was arrived in the Bergamasco, on receiving Advice of thither L'Escud with Part of the Troops to recover the Town. But L'Escud being repulsed by the People, Lautrech himself

D. 1521. coured by so great a Number of Swiss as were then in Piacenza, and because he thought himself insufficient to defend so many Places at once, he sent Orders to Federigo da Bozzolo to abandon Parma. His Enterprize met with Success; for tho' the Bishop of Pistoia had Orders from the Cardinal de' Medici, as soon as he had Advice of the Rebellion of Cremona, to send thither Part of the Swiss for securing that Acquisition, yet being unwilling to divide those Troops, or to employ himself in any other Business than gratifying his Desire of marching with the Swiss on an Enterprize which was designed against Genoa, he delayed so long that Lautrech, who was still Master of the Castle, there being none to defend the Town against him but the People, who immediately sent Ambassadors to demand Pardon for their Offence, easily recovered the Place. On this Success he was mightily encouraged, and sent Orders to Federigo da Bozzolo not to quit Parma; but Federigo had already left it, and had passed the Po with his Troops; and Vitello, who was on his March with his Regiment for Piacenza, being not far from

THE Generals were now intent on acquiring the rest of the State of Milan, with a Design to reduce the Expences of the War to a more moderate Standard, for which End the Marquis of Pescara was sent from Milan with the Spanish, German, and Grison Troops to lay Siege to Como. After a Battery had begun to play, the Garrison of the City, despairing of Relief, capitulated on Condition that the French Como surrendered. Soldiers and the Inhabitants of the Place should be safe in their Persons and Effects. But when the French were ready to depart the Spaniards entered the Town, and plundered it, to the great Reproach of the Marquis, who not long afterwards was charged by Giovanni Garbaneo, Commander of the French Troops in Como, with Breach of Faith, and challenged to fight a Duel.

Veruli im-

Swiss.

AT this Time also was the Bishop of Veruli sent to the Swiss to confirm them in their friendly Dispositions, but on his Arrival at Belinzzone they committed him into Custody; for as they were dissatisfied with the Proceedings of their Troops against the King of France, they complained not only of the Cardinal of Sion and of the Pope, and all his Ministers, but among others particularly of Veruli, who residing with them in Quality of the Pope's Nuncio had laboured to induce them to contravene the Exception with which they had been granted.

THE Affairs of the War were reduced to such a Situation as to afford the Pontiff and Cæsar great Hopes of securing the Victory, because the King of France could not under a long time send new Forces into Italy, and the Power of those Potentates who had taken from him Milan with the greater Part of that Dutchy, seemed sufficient not only to preserve what they had acquired, but to conquer what as yet remained in the Hands of the Enemy,

Enemy. And indeed the Venetian Senate, terrified at such great Success, and apprehensive that the War which was begun against others would be brought home to their own Doors, put the Pope in Hopes that they would procure the French Troops to depart out of their Dominions. But a sudden and unforeseen Event produced as sudden a Change in the Scene of Affairs by the Death of Pope Leo, who unexpectedly departed this Life on the first Day of December in his Villa at Magliano, to which he frequently retired for his Recreation. He had received with inexpressible Pleasure the News of the Acquisition of Milan, and was seized the same Night with a slow Fever; the next Day he was carried to Rome, and tho' his Disorder in the Beginning was reckoned by the Physicians of no Consequence, it carried him off in a very few Days, not without strong Suspicions of Poison, administered to him, as imagined, by Bernabo Malaspina his Chamberlain, whose Office it was to give him Drink. But tho' he was imprisoned on that Suspicion, the Affair was no further examined, because the Cardinal de' Medici, as soon as he came to Rome, had him set at Liberty, that he might have no Occasion to contract greater Enmity with the King of France, by whose Procurement, it was whispered, tho' by uncertain Authority and Conjecture, that Bernabo had administered the Poison.

LEO left the World, if you regard the Opinion of Men, when he was in the Midst of his Glory and Felicity, by the Reduction of Milan being delivered from Dangers, and from those infinite Expences, for which, tho' quite exhausted of Money, he was constrained to provide at any Rate; and because a few Days before his Death he received the News of the Acquisition of Piacenza, and on the very Day that he died he had Advice of that of Parma; Events which he so ardently desired that we are assured that, when he resolved to undertake a War against the French, he said to the Cardinal de' Medici, who dissuaded him from it, that his principal Motive was his Desire to recover those two Cities to the Church, and that whenever he should obtain that A. D. 1521. Favour he should be content to die. He was a Prince worthy to be praised as well as blamed on many Accounts, and who greatly deceived the Expectations conceived of him at his Assumption to the Pontificate, since he appeared to be endowed with greater Prudence, but with much less Goodness, than all had imagined.

THE Death of the Pontiff greatly weakened the Interests of Cæsar in Lombardy, for there was no Room to doubt but that the King of France, resuming Courage by his Deliverance from an Enemy by whose Money the War had been commenced and supported, would send a new Army into Italy, and that the Venetians for the same Reason would continue in Confederacy with him. Hence the Designs of attacking Cremona and Genoa were laid aside, and the Ministers of Cæsar, who had hitherto with Difficulty paid the Spanish Troops, were constrained not without Danger to diminish the Number of their Forces, while the King of France kept Affairs of Italy affected by the Pope's Death.

A. D. kept Possession of Cremona, Genoa, Alessandria, the Castle of Milan, with the Fortresses of Novara, Trezzo, Pizzichitone, Domussola, and Arona, and all the Lago Maggiore. The Fort of Pontremoli also which had been seized by the Enemy was recovered by Sinibaldo dal Fiesco, and the Count of Noceto, and reduced to his Obedience. Nor had the Affairs of the King of France beyond the Mountains all this while a prosperous Course, for Cæsar carrying his Arms against him took the City of Tournay, and soon after the Cittadel, in which were great Stores of Cannon and Ammunition.

Tournay

THE Pope's Death occasioned an Introduction of new Governments, new Counsels, and new Orders in the Dutchy of Milan. The Cardinals of Sion and Medici immediately set out for Rome, to be present at the Election of a new Pontiff. The Cæsarean Generals keeping only Fifteen Hundred Swiss, dismissed all the rest with the German Foot; the Troops of the Florentines returned towards Tuscany, those of the Church went Part of them them under the Conduct of Guido Rangone A. D. 1521. to Modena, another Part under the Marquis of Mantoua remained in the State of Milan, rather in Pursuance of their own Resolution than by the Consent of the College of Cardinals, which being divided within itself could come to no Determination on any Point; so that when Lau-treck made his Complaint to them that the Soldiers of the Church had taken up their Quarters in the Dutchy of Milan to the Prejudice of the King of France, who, from the extraordinary pious Services performed by his Predecessors to the Church, had obtained the Title of her Defender and eldest Son, they could agree on no other Answer or Resolution, than that they referred his Grievance to the Determination of the future Pope. Part of the Swiss who were in Piacenza marched with the Bishop of Pistoia to Modena for the Security of that City and of Reggio against the Duke of Ferrara, who since the Death of Leo X. had taken the Field with One Hundred Men at Arms, Two Thousand Foot, and Three Hundred light Horse, and by a voluntary some little Difficulty Lugo, Bagnacavallo,

THE Swiss of the Canton of Zurich remained at Piacenza, and because they would not separate themselves could not be induced to spare One Thousand of their Men for the Defence of Parma.
 That City remaining in a Manner unpro-vided gave Encouragement to Lautrech, who was in Cremona with Six Hundred Lances and Two Thousand Five Hundred Foot, to attempt to retake it; being stimulated also to the Enterprize by the pressing Sollicitations especially of Federigo da Bozzolo, who by his particular Dexterity in the Management of Affairs of that Nature had obtained great Confidence in his Conduct. It was designed that Bon-

Five Hundred Men, should make a sudden Attack on that City, which had a ^{A. D. 1521.} Garrison of Seven Hundred Italian Foot, and Fifty Men at Arms of the Marquis of Mantoua, the People well disposed in their Affections to the Church, but ill armed, and dispirited by the Memory of the French, and of the Severities exercised by Federigo; and that Part of the City which had been battered when it was besieged by the Church, where the Walls had been beaten down, was still in Ruins without the least Reparation. To this might be added the Vacancy of the Apostolic See, during which the Minds of the People are usually fluctuating and irresolute, and the Governors more attentive to their own Safety than to the Defence of Towns, as not knowing for whom they are to expose themselves to Danger.

ON this Foundation then the French Infantry were sent by Night down the Po to Torricella, where they were joined by the Men at Arms which came from Crema by Land, and having taken Care to

A. D. 1521. bring along a good Number of Boats from Cremona, they passed the Po in the Night at Torricella twelve Miles distant from Parma, leaving Orders for Marc' Antonio Colonna with the Venetian Foot, who were encamped on the Oglio, to follow them. This Design being apprehended the same Night by Francesco Guicciardini, who was come from Milan, by Orders of the Cardinal de' Medici, to take upon him the Care of Parma, he called an Assembly of the People in the Night, and, exhorting them to defend themselves, distributed among them One Thousand Pikes, which he had two Days before, suspecting some Accidents might happen, caused to be brought from Reggio. Hence he carefully attended on making the necessary Provisions for defending himself, being sensible of many Difficulties on account of the small Number of regular Troops that were in the Place, which were not sufficient to maintain it without the Assistance of the People, on which, such is the Nature of the Multitude, in sudden and dangerous Cases, he could lay no solid Foundation of Confidence.

Considering also that he could not prevent ^{A. D.} the Enemy from entering the Codiponte, ^{1521.} he withdrew the Soldiers and all the Inhabitants of the Place into another Part of the City, but not without extreme Difficulty, because many of the People were vainly persuaded that it was possible to defend it, and those who inhabited that Part, thinking it hard to be forced to abandon their own Houses, could neither by Reasons nor Authority be disposed to leave them before the Approach of the Enemies. The long Delay of the Parmesans in consenting to retire had very like to have drawn the French along with them into the other Part of the Town, where were many Difficulties, and especially a Want of Money at a Time of great Necessity, for it happened to be the very Day appointed for the Payment of the Troops, who protested that if they were not paid the next Day they would leave the City.

ON the first Day Federigo da Bozzolo with Three Thousand Foot and some light Horse entered the Codiponte, which

A. D. 1521. was abandoned, and was followed the Day after by Bonneval with the French Lances, and Marc' Antonio Colonna with Two Thousand Venetian Foot; but they had no other Artillery than two Sakers, the very bad Roads at this Season lying low, and full of Water from the Neighbourhood of the Po, rendering it impossible or at least very difficult to convey Cannon large enough for Battery: besides that could not be done without losing more Time than was consistent with that Expedition on which they founded their Hopes, imagining, tho' without Reason, that Parma would receive Succours either from Modena or Piacenza. The People however were possessed with an Opinion, from the Reports of the Peasants who were fled into the Place, that the heavy Artillery was on the Road, which wonderfully terrified them, and much the more because Federigo, having taken some Citizens in their Territory, after he had, by means of some Rebels of Parma, who attended him, cunningly made them believe that Marc' Antonio Colonna was coming with a very numerous Body of Troops

Troops furnished with a Train of Artillery, ^{A. D.} gave them Permission to go into Parma. ^{1521.}

Here, by magnifying the Forces of the Enemy much above the Truth, they filled the People with so great a Terror, that not only the Multitude in every Quarter of the City, but the Councils, and those Magistrates who were intrusted with the Affairs of the Community, began openly to importune the Governor to prevent the Danger of having himself and the Garrison made Prisoners, and to save the Town from being plundered, by hearkening to an Agreement. While the Governor was opposing their Sollicitations by Arguments and by Intreaties, and the Time was wasted in Disputes, a new Difficulty arose; for it being the Time of Payment, the Foot made a Mutiny, and gave Intimations that they intended to quit the City. The Commissary however, after many Persuasions, prevailed with the Citizens, who were grown cool in performing what they had before promised, to provide Part of the Money, representing to them that this Disbursement would, at all Events, prove of no inconsiderable Service towards their Justification, on all Occasions, with future Popes. With this Money he appeased, as well as he could, the Tumult, which had increased the Fears of the People, and the Soldiers seeing themselves but few in Number, and therefore in the Power of the Inhabitants, whom they understood to be wavering in their Disposition in all Parts of the City, were possessed with a vehement Suspicion that they should be attacked from within and from without the Walls at the same Time, for which Reason they had rather the Town were surrendered by Capitulation on Condition of Safety to themselves, than remain exposed to so great a Danger. In this Situation when Affairs were reduced to no small Straits, nothing was more necessary than the Constancy of the Governor, who sometimes protested to the Soldiers that he would share with them in the common Danger, sometimes encouraged the principal Citizens met all together in Council, and reasoning with them shewed the Vanity of their Fears, because he had certain Intelligence that the Enemy had brought no heavy Cannon non with them, without which it was ^{A. D.} ridiculous to imagine that by the Help ^{1521.} of Scaling-ladders they could force an Entrance into the Town, where the young Men, in conjunction with the Soldiers, were sufficient to resist a much greater Force: That he had sent to Modena, where lay the Swiss and Vitello and Guido Rangone with their Troops, to demand Succours; and that he did not doubt but, by the End of the next Day at farthest, they would receive such Relief from them as would constrain the Enemy to remove; for the Regard to their own Honour, with the Apprehensions that the Loss of Parma might be followed by a greater Disorder, would oblige them, considering the great Number of Troops which they had with them, to advance forwards. He had sent also, he said, for the same Purpose, to Piacenza, whence he had very great Hopes for the same Reasons. They ought to consider, he told them, that since the Pope was dead, from whom he had received Honours and Promotions, he had no Obligation or Motive remaining on him, which could prevail upon him, if Affairs had been in that Situation in which they imagined them to be, to expose himself voluntarily to such manifest Danger. For it had always been demonstrated, by Experience, that the Ministers of a deceased Pontiff could never expect any Place or Reward from the succeeding Pope: On the contrary it might easily happen that the new Pontiff might be an Enemy to Florence his native Country; for which Reason he had no Cause for public or private Respects to desire the Grandeur of the Church, but many Cases might well happen in which he should be highly pleased with her Depression: He had neither Wife nor Children, or any Possessions in Parma, which could create in him a Concern or Fear that if the City should return under the Dominion of the French they should be exposed to their Lust, Insolence, or Rapine; he had therefore, for his own Part, no Reason to hope for any Advantage if Parma were defended, nor Cause to apprehend, from its Surrendry, any of those Calamities which it had experienced under the galling Yoke of the French;

French; and since he should expose his A. D.
 Person to the same Dangers with the rest, ^{1521.} in case it should be taken by Force, they might assure themselves that his Resolution to stay in the Place proceeded from no other Motive than his being well satisfied that the Troops of the Enemy having no heavy Artillery, as to his certain Knowledge they had not, were incapable of forcing the Town: If he had doubted of their Security he should not have opposed their coming to an Agreement, from a Desire which he has in common with all other Men of his own Preservation, especially considering that the Apostolic See being vacant, and the regular Force which he had in Parma insufficient to controul the Inclinations of the People, nothing could be laid to his Charge, nor any Blame result to himself, from this their Resolution.

WITH these Reasons, sometimes con-other Provisions, he had amused them all the Night; for he had understood that tho' they were ardently desirous to capitulate, for no other Reasons but the extreme Fear in which they stood of being forced and plundered, yet they were restrained by knowing that if they made an Agreement without his Consent they must expect to be stigmatised as Rebels. But at Break of the Day dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle, and when now it began to be known by the Balls discharged from two Sakers which had been planted that Night, that the Enemy had no Artillery for battering the Wall, the Governor believed that at his Return to Council he should find the whole Assembly of another Mind, and full of Security. But he found them of a quite contrary Disposition, and their Fears were augmented in proportion as they fancied themselves, since the Day was now begun, approaching still nearer to the Danger. Hence they would no longer hearken to Reasons, but begun, not only with the most open Instances, but with Protests, and with a kind of tacit Menaces to urge the Governor to consent to a Capitulation. But he resolutely answered them that since it was not in his Power to prevent them from taking such Counsels, or forming such Designs, as it would be if he had but a greater Force in Parma, he had no other Satisfaction for the Injury which they were consulting to do to the Apostolic See, and to himself its Minister, than to see that if they were resolved to make an Agreement with the Enemy, they could not avoid the Infamy of being noted as Rebels and disloyal to their Sovereign; upbraiding them, in very warm Expressions, with the Oath of Fidelity which they had but a few Days before in the Great Church solemnly taken, as administered by him, to the Apostolic See; and protesting that tho' he were to have before his Eyes the most evident Tokens of present Death from their Hands, they might rest themselves assured that they should never induce him to alter his Sentiments, unless it should happen that by the Arrival of Reinforcements or of heavy Artillery in the Enemy's Camp, or by some other Accident, the Danger of their Ruin should should overbalance the Hopes of their Defence. With these Words he abruptly quitted the Council, partly to leave his Speeches sounding in their Ears, and imprinted in their Breasts with the greater Authority, and partly to give Orders about many Things which were necessary if the Enemy, as it was expected, were resolved to give the Assault that Day, leaving the Assembly in Suspense, and in a kind of Astonishment for a long Time. At last Fear prevailing above all other Considerations, they resolved, whatever might happen, to send out Deputies to treat about surrendering the Town, and ordered some of their Number to wait on the Commissary, and protest that, if he obstinately persisted in refusing his Consent for consulting their own Safety, they were disposed to do it by themselves, in order to avoid the most evident Danger of a Sack. But, just at the Time when the Message was ready to be delivered, Shoutings began to be heard from those who were appointed to guard the Gates and the Walls, and the Bells of the highest Tower in the City by their Ringing Ringling gave Notice that the Enemy was advancing from the Codiponte in regular Order to give the Assault, and were approached the Wall. The Commissary on this Occasion, turning himself to the Messengers, who had not yet spoken, said to the People “ It is too late now to think of an Agreement tho’ we should be all of the same Mind ; we have nothing to do but to defend ourselves honourably, or submit like Cowards to be plundered or taken Prisoners, unless you are willing to run the Fate of Ravenna and Capua, which were entered and plundered while they were treating of an Agreement with the Enemy under their Walls. I myself have hitherto done as much as it was possible for one Man to do, and have, with an Eye to your Advantage, brought you into such a Situation as renders it necessary for you either to conquer or to die. If it lay in my Power alone to defend the City, I should not be wanting to its Defence ; but since that is not to be done without your Assistance, shew yourselves therefore no less resolute and ardent to defend, as you easily may, your Lives and Effects, importunate in your Desires to throw yourselves, without any Necessity, under Subjection to the French, whom you know to be all your most capital Enemies."

AFTER these Words he turned his Horse another Way, and every one remaining confounded with Fear, and convinced that it was now too late to have Recourse to other Remedies, laid aside all Thoughts of a Capitulation. And indeed it was necessary to attend to their Defence, for a Part of the Enemies, with a vast Number of Ladders, which they had got together in the Country the Day before, approached a Bastion which Federigo had formerly caused to be erected on the Side towards the Po, and attacked it with great Vigour; and at the same time another Body gave a very furious Assault on the Gate that leads towards Reggio, while Attacks were also made in two other Places, with the greater Disadvantage to the Defendants as the Enemies were fresher, and stimulated by

by the Speeches of the Generals, especially of Federigo; and the Men of the Town being full of Terror, durst not, a very few excepted, approach the Wall, but for the most part chose rather to shut themselves up in their Houses, as if they expected every Moment the utter Destruction of the City. These Assaults lasted, with several Renewals, for the Space of four Hours, the Danger of the Defendants continually diminishing not only by the Weariness of the Enemy, who receiving nothing but Repulses and Wounds, and galled from different Quarters, began to lose Courage, but also because the Townsmen observing with what Ease the Defence was made, ran one after another with great Alacrity to the Wall, the Commissary in the mean while bestirring himself, and with great Sollicitude making the necessary Provisions every where; so that before the Assault was ended there was not only a Concourse of all the People, and even of those in religious Orders to fight in Defence of the Wall, but also the Women attended in great Multitudes, carrying Wine and other Refreshments to their Husbands and Relations. Hence the Enemies despairing of Success retired with considerable Loss of Men either killed or wounded to the Codiponte, which they abandoned the next Morning, and after resting a Day or two in the Neighbourhood of Parma returned beyond the Po. Federigo on this Occasion protested that Nothing in this Expedition, of which he had been the Author, had deceived him, if he had not thought it incredible that a Governor who was not a Man of War, and but newly come to that City, should chuse rather to expose himself to Danger without Hopes of Profit, since the Pontiff was dead, than to take the ready Measures for his own Preservation, which he might do without bringing upon himself any Dishonour or Disgrace.

THE Defence of Parma was of considerable Prejudice to the Affairs of the French, for it gave greater Spirits to the People of Milan, and to the other Inhabitants of that State to defend themselves, than they had before, especially as they knew knew that the Place had but a few Soldiers in it, and had received no Succours, for neither had any Motion been made from Piacenza, nor would the Swiss who were at Modena, nor Guido Rangone nor Vitello, send any Troops to the Relief of Parma. Guido alledged that tho' the Duke of Ferrara, after his unsuccessful Siege of Cento defended by the Bolognese, had, at the Coming of the Swiss, retired to Finale, it was still to be feared that if Modena were deprived of its Garrison he would come and attack that City. And as for the Bishop of Pistoia, he stood so long wavering and irresolute between the pressing Instances of Guicciardini and the Persuasions of Vitello, who for his own Interest, solicited him to march with the Swiss into Romagna, in order to prevent the Passage of the Duke of Urbino, that at last he failed them both. For Parma was defended of itself, and the Duke met with no Impediment in Romagna, because the Swiss at last would not move a Step before they had received their Pay. The Duke therefore accompanied by the two Brothers Malatesta and 1521. March, the first to recover the States he had lost, the others to return to Perugia, for which Purpose they had assembled at Ferrara Two Hundred Men at Arms, Three Hundred light Horse, and Three Thousand Foot, who, partly out of Friendship, partly in Hopes of Plunder, voluntarily followed them, for they could obtain no other Favour either of the French or Venetians than barely a Permission to take any of their Soldiers who were willing to serve under them, and the Venetians gave Leave to Malatesta and Oratio to quit their Service. The Duke then with the Brothers set out from Fer- rara for Lugo by the Po, and meeting with no Opposition in the State of the Church, as soon as they approached the Borders of the State of Urbino, the Duke, invited by the People, speedily recovered his whole State, except what was in the Possession of the Florentines; and then turning his March to Pesara recovered the Town with the same Ease; and in a few Days afterwards the Castle; and then Camerino Giovan Maria da Varana, the antient Lord, who for the greater Splendor had obtained of Leo the Title of Duke, introducing in his Room Gismondo a Youth of the same Family, who pretended a better Right to that State; but the Castle held out for the Duke, who had taken Refuge in Aquila. After executing this Enterprize, the Duke with Malatesta and Oratio Baglioni directed their March to Perugia, which the Florentines had undertaken to defend, not so much in pursuance of their own Counsel as in compliance with the Will of the Cardinal de' Medici, who was influenced by Hatred or Enmity conceived against the Duke of Urbino and the Baglioni, or imagining that their Neighbourhood might endanger his Authority in Florence, or because, as he aspired to the Pontificate, he was willing to gain the Reputation of being the sole Defender of the Church in the Vacation of the See. For the College of Cardinals took not the least Care to defend any Part of the ecclesiastic Dominion either in Lombardy, or in Tuscany, or any where else, partly because the Cardinals were divided into different Factions, and every one was deeply intent on Projects for advancing himself to the Pontificate, and partly because Leo had left no Sum of Money either in the Papal Treasury, nor in the Castle of Santi' Angelo. For that Pope by his Prodigality had not only wasted the Treasure accumulated by Julius, and the incredible Sums raised from Offices newly created, with a Diminution of Forty Thousand Ducats of the yearly Revenue of the Church, but had left her vastly in Debt, and had pawned all the Jewels and precious Things of the pontifical Treasury ; so that it was wittily said by a certain Person, “ other Pontificates ended at the Death of the Popes, but that of Leo continued several Years after his Decease.” The College only sent Archbishop Orsino to Perugia, in order to treat of some Agreement with the Baglioni, but that Prelate being suspected by Gentile on account of his Relation by Kindred to the Sons of Gian Pagolo, and propounding to him Conditions which he thought insufficient for his Security, the Treaty came to Nothing ; so that on

 Duke of Urbino, Malatesta, Oratio Baglioni, and Camillo Orsino, which last was followed by some Volunteers, who had newly joined them, went and encamped at the Bridge of San Janni, whence extending themselves as far as Bastia and the neighbouring Places, they infested Day and Night the City of Perugia. Within this Place besides Five Hundred Foot in the Pay of Gentile, the Florentines, who by the Duke's turning his Arms against Pesaro had Time to provide for the Defence of that City, had put Two Thousand Foot and One Hundred light Horse under Guido Vaina, and One Hundred and Twenty Men at Arms and One Hundred light Horse commanded by Vitello.

IN the mean time the Affairs of the Milanese were in a perfect Stagnation, and nothing was attempted by either Party but Plunder and Excurfions. By this Method the more effectually to distress the Places held by the Church, the French who remained in Cremona, to the Number of Two Thousand Foot, laid a Bridge frequent Inroads into the Piacentine and Parmigian, and infested the whole Country. And tho' Prospero, at the Sollicitations of the other Generals gave out that he would besiege Trezzo, and the Artillery was on the Road for that Purpose, yet he never put his Design in Execution, alledging that it was not proper that the Army should be employed about one Place, but be always in Readiness to succour the State of the Church if the French should offer to invade it. But in this Respect his Words did not seem to agree with his Sentiments, for when he had Notice that the Enemy was marched to make an Attempt on Parma he gave no Sign that he intended to succour the Place, but said that it was necessary to expect the Event, nay when Piacenza was abandoned, and remained without a Garrison, on the sudden Departure of the Zurichan Swiss by the Commandment of their Superiors, Prospero did his utmost to prevent the Marquis of Mantoua from marching with his Troops thither from Milan, tho' the Marquis by his Presence in Piacenza with the Troops of his own Dominion, and sometimes advancing a Sum of Money as Necessity required, acquitted himself with the highest Honour in the Preservation of that City.

NOR was there any Provision made against so dangerous a Juncture by the Election of a new Pontiff, which, to the very great Prejudice of the ecclesiastic State was deferred to give Time to the absent Cardinals to repair to Rome, and also by the Detention of the Cardinal of Jurea in his Way from Turin to Rome, in the State of Milan, by the Orders of Prospero Colonna, that he might not be present at the Conclave, because he was in the French Interest. On this Account the College made a Decree that the Entrance into the Conclave should be delayed for as many Days as Cardinal Jurea had been, or should be for the future stopped from proceeding on his Journey. At length upon his Release the Conclave was shut on the 27th Day of December, in which were present thirty-nine Cardinals, so greatly was their Number multiplied

A. D. 1521. plied by the immoderate Promotion made by Leo, at whose Creation no more than four and twenty Cardinals were assembled.

THE first Transaction of the Year 1522 was the Revolution in the State of Perugia, which was brought about, as every one imagined, more by the Cowardice of the Defendants than by the Valour of those who attacked the Place. The Enemy, being increased with a Body of Volunteers, and amounting to the Number of Two Hundred Men at Arms, Three Hundred light Horse, and Five Thousand Foot, possessed themselves of the Suburb of San Pietro, which was abandoned by the Garrison, and having ruined the Defences in several Places with seven Field Pieces lent them by the Duke of Ferrara, on the Fourth Day of the new Year gave the Assault with a vast Number of Scaling-Ladders at the Gates of San Pietro, Sogli and Brogni, and at several other Quarters. The Assault began at Daybreak, and with several Abate-ments of its Fury, may be said to have continued almost the whole Day; and tho' tho' in two or three Places the Enemy entered the Town, which was only defended by the Soldiers, for the Inhabitants would not stir, they were still beaten out again with considerable Loss. Hence Gentile and the Florentine Commissary were in high Spirits, and flattered themselves they should as easily defend the Place Day after Day. But the Timorousness of Vittello was the Cause that Things had a far different Event; for he fearing that the People being more inclined to the Sons of Gian Pagolo than to Gentile would make some Commotion in their Favour, and it appearing to him of no small Importance that the Enemies had their Quarters in the Suburbs between the two Gates of San Piero *, but above all induced by a Suspicion he had entertained that in case of ill Success his own Life was in Danger on account of the Hatred, which he knew he had incurred, of the Duke of Urbino and the Sons of Gian Pagolo, gave Notice in the Night to the other Generals that he intended to be gone, gone, alledging that his Stay could be of no manner of Service. For the Day before in the Time of the Assault, he received a Shot in the little Toe of his right Foot, which pained him to such a Degree that he was forced to keep his Bed. And tho' Gentile and the others endeavoured with many Intreaties to induce him to alter his Resolution, demonstrating to him how much his Departure would dishearten the Soldiers and the People of the City, yet finding him obstinate they determined to follow him. Thus in that same Night they went away to Citta di Castello, and Perugia received within its Walls the Brothers Baglioni, to the incredible Surprise of all those who, having received Notice by Letters written the same Night of the happy Success obtained against the Enemy the Day before, had Intelligence a few Hours after that Vitello and the rest had cowardly abandoned their Posts.

The Baglioni restored to Perugia.

THE Election of a new Pontiff had not as yet taken Effect, being delayed by the Disagreement between the Cardinals, which which was principally occasioned by the Cardinal de' Medici. For that Prelate ^{A. D. 1522.} aspiring to the Pontificate, and bearing a great Sway on account of his Grandeur and vast Revenues, and from the Glory he had acquired by the Reduction of Milan, had gained over to himself the Votes of Fifteen other Cardinals, induced either by their own Interests, or on the Score of Friendship, or by the Favours they had received from Leo; and some of them by the Hopes that, since they despaired of obtaining the Pontificate for themselves, he would become a Favourer of those who should shew themselves ready to espouse his Interests. But many Objections concurred to cross his Desires; for to many of the Cardinals it appeared of pernicious Consequence, that a deceased Pontiff should be succeeded by one of the same Family, as shewing a Precedent for making the Popedom descend by hereditary Succession. He was opposed by all the old Cardinals, who, having Pretensions of their own to so high a Dignity, thought it intolerable that a Person under Fifty Years of Age should be preferred before before them. Among his Opposers were also all those of the Imperial Faction: For Cardinal Colonna, tho' at the Beginning he had shown himself ready to vote in his Favour, acted afterwards very openly in defeating his Measures; but his most bitter Enemies were those Cardinals who had been dissatisfied with Leo. There was however, in the Midst of these Difficulties one Circumstance which most effectually supported his Hopes, since his Adherents were more than a Third of the College, and while they kept themselves united no Election could be made without their Consent. Hence he was in Hopes that by Length of Time his Adversaries, among whom were many by Age incapable of bearing long Fatigue, would either be tired out, or separate from one another; besides, tho' they agreed among themselves in not creating him they disagreed about creating others, each proposing to himself his own Election or that of his Friends, and many of them most obstinately bent not to yield one to another. But the Revolution in the State of Perugia mollified in some measure sure the Obstinacy of the Cardinal de' A. D.

Medici, through the Instances of Cardinal ^{1522.} de' Petrucci, one of his Adherents. This Cardinal, who was at the Head of the Administration in Siena, being apprehensive that by his Absence the Affairs of that City, on which he understood that the Duke of Urbino designed to turn his Arms, would undergo some considerable Change, eagerly solicited the Election of a new Pope. At his Instances, accompanied with an interested Regard to the Danger which the Government of Florence would incur from any Change in the Administration of Affairs at Siena, the Cardinal de' Medici began to incline to an Election, but was not quite determined as to the Person he would have chosen. But it happened one Morning in the Conclave that while a Scrutiny * was

* When each Cardinal has put his Billet with the Name of the Person whom he has chosen into a Chalice, and it appears by these Billets that one Cardinal has got two Thirds of the Votes, such a one is then said to be elected by Scrutiny. But there are two other Ways of electing a Pope, which are by Access and Adoration; By Access is when the Election is made by a Concurrence of Voices without writing in Billets. By way of Adoration is when two Thirds of the Cardinals without expecting a Scrutiny come to salute and adore a Person as Pope.

 was making according to Custom, there was proposed Adrian Cardinal of Tortosa, by Nation a Fleming, but who had been a Tutor to Cæsar in his Childhood, and by his Means promoted by Leo to the Cardinalship, and was at that Time Cæsar's Lieutenant in Spain. But tho' the Proposal was made without an Inclination in any one to agree to his Election, and only to waste away the Morning, yet some Votes beginning to appear in his Favour, the Cardinal of San Sisto took occasion to make an Harangue in Praise of his excellent Qualities and Learning, on which he enlarged almost without ceasing till he had induced some of the Cardinals to yield to his Reasons, and then the rest, one after another, more by Impulse than Deliberation, followed their Example. Thus was Adrian, by the unanimous Consent of the whole Conclave, that either by past Favours, Merit or Conversation, ingratiated himself with any of the other Cardinals, who hardly knew him by Name, and one who had never seen Italy, or had any Thoughts or Hopes of seeing it. The sacred College having no Reason to offer in Justification of so extraordinary a Step, excused themselves by transferring the Cause on the Holy Ghost, who is wont, as they said, to inspire the Hearts of the Cardinals in the Election of Popes. Adrian received the News of his Election at Vittoria, a City of Biscay, on which Advice he would assume no other Name than what he had before, but passed under the Denomination of Adrian the Sixth.

A CHANGE being effected in the State of Perugia, after the Troops had for some Days remained unactive with considerable Prejudice to their other Designs, the Duke of Urbino and the other Commanders, intending to make Collections of Money from their Friends, marched away from Perugia and Todi, to which

A. D. 1522. last Place Camillo Orsino had restored the Exiles, and leaving Malatesta in Perugia advanced with great Speed towards Siena. They were attended by Lattantio Petrucci, whom Leo had deprived of the Bishopric of Soana, because Borghese and Fabio, Sons of Pandolfo Petrucci, had been forbidden by the Imperial Ministers to depart out of Naples. In Siena the Regency had no other Hopes than in procuring the Assistance of the Florentines by means of the Correspondence which they held with the Cardinal de' Medici. At his Instances those of his Party who governed the State of Florence in his Absence, as soon as they heard that the Duke was marched from Perugia immediately ordered to Siena Guido Vaina with One Hundred light Horse, and Money to raise an additional Body of Foot to those which had been listed by the Senese. But their principal Dependance was on the Forces which had been provided many Days before; for as soon as they had been informed of the first Motion of the Duke of Urbino, and the Baglioni, being under Concern for the Affairs of Tuscany they had treated of taking into Pay the Swiss of the Canton A. D. of Bern, who to the Number of above 1522.

One Thousand had stopped with the Bishop of Pistoia at Cologna, despising the Orders they had received from their Supeririors to return to Swisserland. The Negotiation of this Treaty, tho' on account of many Difficulties raised by the Bishop of Pistoia, who was desirous of presenting these Troops to the future Pope, it was spun out to a greater Length than Necessity required, was at last concluded at a very great Expence; there were beside taken into Pay an additional Number of Four Hundred German Foot which had joined with the Swiss in Bologna. They had also called Giovanni de' Medici from Lombardy, and did not doubt but with these Succours, provided they arrived in due Season, to secure the Affairs of Siena; which were however in a very dangerous Situation, because the greater Part of the People were Enemies to the present Government, and out of their antient Hatred of the Florentines were universally dissatisfied, and could not with Patience endure that their Troops should enter Siena. And the Danger was increased by the Absence of Cardinal Petrucci, and tho' his Nephew Francesco, who supplied his Place, did all that was in his Power to support the Administration, his Authority had not so much Weight as that of the Cardinal. As soon therefore as the Duke of Urbino had entered the Territory of Siena, the Senese sent, without Controul from the chief Men of the City, who were intent on making their Flight, and on avoiding, at any Rate, the present Danger, Ambassadors to enter into a Treaty with him. The Duke at first insisted on an Alteration in the Government and Thirty Thousand Ducats, but afterwards moderated his Demands in such a Manner as made it strongly apprehended that either by Consent of those in the Regency, or by some Movement of the People contrary to the Magistracy's Intentions, some Composition would be made between the Duke and the Senese. But when the Florentine Troops continued to enter Siena, and a Report was spread that Giovanni de' Medici was not far off with the Swiss, those who were averse to an Agreement were the more encouraged to prevent its being brought to a Conclusion. So that when the Duke approached the Walls of Siena, having no more than Seven Thousand Men in his Army, and those collected of all Sorts, after staying a Day the Hopes of an Accommodation diminishing, and the Swiss approaching within a Days Journey, he decamped from before Siena in order to return to his own Dutchy. The same Troops that had succoured Siena now turned their March towards Perugia, the Florentines laying hold on the Opportunity to gratify their own eager Desires from the Sollicitations of the College of Cardinals, by whose Authority the State of the Church is governed in the Absence of a Pope, for which Reason the Cardinal of Cortona, who had been Legate of Perugia since the Time of Leo, marched in Person with the Army.

A. D.

that each Month the Administration of Affairs should be in the Hands of three Cardinals under the Name of Priors, whose Office was to assemble the others, and to give Orders for the Execution of the Resolutions. Three then of those who had newly entered on their Office, and opposed the Cardinal de' Medici, who immediately after the Election of a Pope had returned to Florence, began to exclaim against the Florentines for molesting the Towns of the Church, for they had plundered the Town of Passignano for refusing to give them Quarters, and afterwards took up their Quarters at Olmo three Miles from Perugia in almost certain Hopes of getting Possession of that City, and would have despised the Orders of the Priors if they had not soon discovered that their Hopes were ill grounded. For the Baglioni had got into Perugia a great Number of Soldiers, and their Authority with the People was much greater than

that they had no Intention to resist the Will of the College, and entered into the Monte Feltro, which except San Leo and the Castle of Mailolo, had returned in Subjection to the Duke of Urbino, who having easily recovered it, there was a Cessation of Arms as it were by tacit Consent on that Side: For the Duke was not potent enough to continue the War against the Florentines, nor had that People any Reason, either for their own Profit or for the Satisfaction of others, to molest the Duke, because the College, of whom the Adversaries of the Cardinal de' Medici were the strongest Party, had at the same time agreed with the Duke that he should keep Possession of his recovered State till the Arrival of the Pontiff in Italy, and afterwards during the Pope's Pleasure, on condition that he should not molest the Florentines nor Senese, nor enter into the Service of any Prince nor any ways assist him.

THE Affairs of Lombardy had hitherto proceeded in a peaceable Course, through the Want of Men on one Side, and of

A. D. Money on the other. Wherefore the Imperial Troops refusing to move out of their Quarters before they were paid, Giovanni da Saffatello only with his own Regiment, and with the other Soldiers and Subjects of the Dutchy of Milan, was ordered to lay Siege to Alessandria. That Officer in the Beginning of the War had exchanged a certain Benefit for uncertain Hopes, by quitting the Service of the Venetians and entering into the Pay of the Duke of Milan, while he was yet an Exile from his State. On his Approach to Alessandria the Rashness of the Guelfs of that Place, by whom it was defended more than by the French Soldiers, facilitated what all had accounted a difficult Enterprise. For proving too weak to sustain the Shock of the Enemy upon whom they had sallied in order to skirmish, they gave them an Opportunity to enter with them promiscuously into the City, which was pillaged by the Conquerors. And a few Days after with the same Facility were some French Troops driven out of Asti, into which City they had been introduced by

BUT now this short and dubious State of Tranquility appeared but as a Prelude to very great Disorders ; for though there had been very warm Debates in the Diets of the Swiss on the Demands of the King of France, the Cantons of Zurich and Schnitz being obstinately bent against him; and that of Lucern wholly disposed in his Favour, the other Cantons divided among themselves, and the Affairs of the Public confounded by the Avarice of private Men, many of whom demanded of the King some Pensions, some old Debts, yet they had at last granted the Foot demanded for the Recovery of the Dutchy of Milan. Swiss of Money of the King of England, who had renounced his Friendship with the French, had ordered to Trent Girolamo Adorno, with a Commission to raise Six Thousand German Foot, and to conduct them, together with the Person of Francesco Sforza, to Milan. The Presence of Sforza was at that Time reckoned of great Moment for keeping the more secure Possession of Milan and of the other Towns of the State, which highly desired him, and to facilitate the raising of Money, of which there was an extreme Want, by virtue of his Favour and Authority. At the same time the Provision made by Cæsar being unknown at Milan, the Milanese had sent Money to Trent for raising Four Thousand Foot, which being in Readiness at Adorno's Arrival there he immediately put himself in Motion with them, while the other Six Thousand were in Levy, towards Milan, by the Valley of the Valtellina that leads to Como. But the Grisons refusing them Passage they suddenly turned their Way into their Territory of Bergamo, and from thence to the Ghiaradadda with such Speed that the Venetian Officers who were

 and after they had made their Way to Milan they returned with the same Expedition to Trent, for conducting Francesco Sforza and the other Troops to Milan.
 In this City, besides other Provisions, vast Pains were taken to increase the Hatred of the People, which was very great, against the French, that they might with the greater Alacrity be ready to stand upon their Defence, and be ready to relieve the public Necessities out of their own private Purfes. This Design was greatly promoted by counterfeit Letters, by false Messages, and by many other Arts and Inventions owing to the Industry and Cunning of Marone. 1522.

BUT these Measures were yet more assisted, and even beyond Belief, by the Preaching of Andrea Barbato, an Austin Friar, who in his Sermons, surrounded by a vast Concourse of People, exhorted the Citizens in most pathetic Strains to stand upon their own Defence, since it had pleased God to grant them the Power to free themselves from the Yoke of the Barbarians, Barbarians, who had been the greatest Enemies to that City. He alledged the Example of Parma, a small and weak City in comparifon of Milan: He fet before them the Examples of their Anceftors, who had made their Name glorious thro' all Italy: He fhewed them the Duty incumbent on all Men to exert their utmoft for the Prefervation of their Country, for the Sake of which if Heathens, who expected no other Reward than Fame, freely expofed themfelves to Death, how great is the Obligation laid upon Chriftians, to whom, if they die in fo pious a Work, is propofed, befides the Glory and Honour of this World, an immortal Life in the Kingdom of Heaven! They fhould confider with themfelves, he told them, the Defttruction that muft be brought on that City by the Succels of the French, from whom, if they had before, without any Caufe, met with fuch bitter and vexatious Treatment, what muft they now expect when they thought themfelves highly offended and injured? No Punifhments that could be inflicted on the People of Milan would be fufficient to fatisfy their Cruelty and and immense Hatred, not all the Substance of that City would be reckoned enough to satiate their Avarice, and they would never rest contented without the utter Extinction of the very Name and Memory of the Milaneſe, and making them an horrible Example ſurpaſſing the ſavage Barbarity of Frederic Barbaroſſa. By this Means the Hatred of the People of Milan againſt the French, and the Dread of their Succeſs were worked up to ſuch a Height that it became neceſſary rather to moderate than to provoke them.

IN the mean time Proſpero attended with vaſt Diligence to the Reparation of the Baſtions, and Ramparts of the Ditches, and putting them in a good State of Defence, with an Intention to ſtay in Milan, where, though the Six Thouſand Germans ſhould not arrive, he was in Hopes to maintain himſelf for ſome Months. At the ſame time, neglecting the Care of other Towns, he had ordered Filippo Tor-niello to Novara, and Monſignorino Viſconti to Aleſſandria, one with Two Thouſand, and the other with Fifteen Hun-dred

A. D. 1522. dred Italian Foot, who, because they were not paid, lived on the People. To Pavia he sent Antonio da Leva with Two Thousand German and a Thousand Italian Foot, and kept with him in Milan Seven Hundred Men at Arms, Seven Hundred light Horse, and Twelve Thousand Foot. The City still remained in imminent Danger of being entered by the French from the Castle; to prevent which, and by the same Expedient to deprive them of the Power of putting Victuals, or other Kinds of Provisions into the Castle, he set about a Work highly celebrated for its Invention, and in the Opinion of the Public almost stupendous. For without the Castle; between the Gates that lead to Vercelli and to Como he caused to be dug two Trenches, and raised of the Earth taken out of each of them a Bank; distant one from another about Twenty Paces, and extending about a Mile across so much of the Garden behind the Castle as lies between the two said Roads: And at each of the Heads of the Trenches he erected a very high and strong Cavalier, in order to plant Artillery on them for annoying the the Enemy if they approached on that Side. These Trenches and Ramparts were guarded by Parties of Foot lodged in the Midst of them, and who at the same time prevented all Succours from entering the Castle, and all Egrefs of the Besieged. That this Invention should prove no less happy than it was ingenious, Fortune was pleased to demonstrate with a lucky Omen in the Beginning by granting that it should be put in Execution without any Loss. For Prospero, improving the Favour of Heaven, in a very deep Snow, ordered two Banks of it to be thrown up before Day, resembling those of which he designed to make Ramparts, and which secured the Workmen from being annoyed by the Artillery of the Castle*. And it happened, very seasonably for bringing these Works to Perfection, that the vast Quantities of Snow which covered the Mountains retarded the Passage of the Swiss.

AT this Juncture Lautrech, having with some Troops sent over the Po surprised

*. It was usual with the Northern People, as we are told by Olaus Magnus, to erect Forts, Redoubts and other Fortifications of Ice.

A. D. 1522! Luigi da Gonzaga in Fiorenzuola, who were found carelessly asleep, reviewed his Forces; and those of the Venetians under Andrea Gritti and Teodora da Trivulzi assembled themselves about Cremona. These Troops being at length joined by the Swiss passed the River Adda on the first Day of March, the chief Command of the Army being settled on Lautrech, whose Authority suffered no Derogation by the Arrival of the Grand Master and the Grand Ecuyer. At the same time arrived in this Army Giovanni de' Medici, who had closely treated about entering into the Service of Francesco Sforza, and had now set out intending for Milan where his Presence was heartily desired on account of the mighty Expectations from his Valour. Being stimulated, however, by the greater and more certain Pay of the King of France, and alledging that the Money promised him had not been sent from Milan; he marched out of the Territory of Parma, where he had plundered the Town of Buffeto for refusing him Quarters, and passed to the French Camp, which lay

two Miles from the Castle of Milan between the Roads to Vercelli and Como. A. D. 1521.

The Army, on the third Day after their Arrival, moved in Order of Battle, and made a Show as if they intended to attack the Ramparts, but did not put it in Execution, either because Lautrech had no such Intention at first, or because having considered the Number of Soldiers that were in the Place, the Disposition of the People, and the Alacrity of the Defendants, he was deterred by the manifest Difficulties attending the Enterprize. The same Day Marc' Antonio Colonna, a General Officer in high Reputation, and Camillo Trivulzio, a natural Son of Gianjacopo, were killed by the Stones of a House that was shattered by the Artillery from the Town, as they were passing together near that House, and giving Orders for erecting a Cavalier that should play with its Cannon between the two Ramparts of the Enemy. But Lautrech, having no Hopes of taking Milan by Force, imagined that he should obtain the Conquest of it by Length of Time; and considering that by the Multitude of his Forces, and the great Number of Fugitives that followed him, he had the Liberty of making Excursions through the greatest Part of the Country, and by that means of giving sufficient Obstruction to the Conveyance of Provisions into the Town, had caused all the Mills to be broken, and the Water to be turned out of the Canals by which the Place received its chief Supplies. He was in Hopes also that the Troops in Garrison would come to want their Pay, since they subsisted on the Money advanced by the Milaneſe, for they received but very small Remittances from Cæſar, and from the Kingdom of Naples and other Places. But ſo inveterate was the Hatred of the People of Milan to the Name of the French and ſo ardent their Deſires of the new Duke, that enduring with Patience every Inconvenience they not only perſiſted in their Reſolution in ſpite of ſo many Vexations, but put the Youth of the City in Arms, and elected in each Pariſh a Captain, aſſiſting with the greateſt Readineſs in mounting the Guard both Day and Night in Places remote from the Army, to the great Relief of

of the Soldiers in their Fatigues ; and the Destruction of the Mills at this Time A. D.
1522. occasioning a Want of Meal, they soon provided against this Inconvenience by erecting Mills that worked without Water.

THE State of the War thus changing from the Hopes of a speedy Conquest to the Cares and Fatigues of a tedious Blockade, the Duke of Milan, whose Departure had been for many Days delayed for Want of Money, and would have been deferred much longer if the Cardinal de' Medici had not assisted him with Nine Thousand Ducats, set out at last from Trent with Six Thousand German Foot, and seizing on the Castle of Croata subject to the Venetians, in order to open himself a Passage, proceeded without Opposition through the Veronese, and from thence through the Mantouan, and passing the Po at Casal Maggiore arrived at Piacenza, from whence, being attended by the Marquis of Mantoua with Three Hundred Men at Arms of the Church, Duke of watching all Opportunities that might favour his Passage to Milan where his Arrival was extremely desired, because the Methods used for raising Money to maintain the Soldiers becoming every Day less effectual, it was judged necessary to join as soon as possible with the Germans, in order to take the Field, and endeavour to bring the War to an Issue. But the Difficulty lay in finding a Passage. For as soon as Lautrech had Advice of the Duke's Arrival at Piacenza, he removed his Camp to Casino five Miles distant from Milan on the Road to Pavia, having ordered the Venetians to Rinasco on the same Road, both Armies being strongly intrenched. After they had remained in this Situation for some Days, making themselves Masters in the mean time of Sant' Angelo and San Columbano, Lautrech received Advice that his Brother L'Escud who had returned with Money from France, whither he had gone to represent to the King the State of Affairs, after enlisting some Foot at Genoa, was arrived in the State of Milan. On this he ordered Federigo da Bozzolo to join him with Four Hundred marched out of Pavia to Gambalo in order to oppose them. But either because the Enemy made a Feint, as he said himself, of retiring towards the Tesino, and therefore he thought his Stay at Gambalo no longer necessary, or as I rather believe, because he was afraid of them, since their Number appeared greater than it had been reported, he marched back to Pavia. But Federigo advanced to Gambalo, and joining L'Escud they proceeded together to Novara, and with the Artillery taken from the Castle, which held out for the French, battered the Town, and took it by Force at the third Assault, in which the greatest Part of the Garrison were killed, and Filippo Torniello remained Prisoner. On the first Notice of this Misfortune the Marquis of Mantoua, who had been solicited by Letters and frequent Messages from Torricello to come to his Relief, and was again marched from Pavia, drew his Troops out of Vigevano, Y 3 leaving

A. D. leaving only a Garrison in the Castle, and 1522. returned to Pavia.

THE Conjunction with L'Escud, and the Acquisition of Novara by the French turned to their Prejudice in a Case of more Importance, since it facilitated the March of Francesco Sforza with the German Infantry to Milan. The Duke, as he had appointed with Prospero, one Night with great Secresy departed from Pavia, leaving for its Defence Two Thousand Foot and Three Hundred Horse under the Command of the Marquis of Mantoua, who unwilling to remove at so great a Distance from the State of the Church refused to proceed any further, and marching by a different Road from the direct was heartily received at Sesto by Prospero, who had gone out with Part of the Troops to meet him, and conducted to Milan. He was received with inexpressible Joy by the People, every one on this Occasion reviving in Memory the lively Idea of the happy Times that passed during the Administration of the Duke's Father, and of the other Dukes of Milan his Predecessors of the Name of A. D.

Sforza, and they were passionately desirous ^{1522.} to have a Prince of their own, as one who would be a greater Lover of his People, more obliged to respect and pay a greater Regard to his Subjects, and not despise them on account of his immoderate Greatness.

THE Departure of the Duke from Pavia put Lautrech in Hopes of making himself Master of that City, wherefore he assembled his Army with all Expedition, and laid Siege to it. On the other Side Prospero knowing the manifest Danger of the Place detached thither with utmost Speed One Thousand Corfican and some Spanish Foot, who arriving near the French Camp, and falling suddenly into their Quarters, made their Way through it, partly by fighting, partly by marching, and after killing many of the Enemy got safe into Pavia, where besides other Inconvenience was a Want of Gunpowder. Lautrech in the mean time erected two Batteries against the Walls of Pavia, one at the Suburb of Santa Maria in Portica, towards the Tesino, and the other at Borgoratto, and having made a Breach of thirty Braces he gave an Assault, but in vain. Perceiving therefore the Besieged to keep themselves well on their Guard, and disposed to defend themselves, he began to despair of the Enterprize. He had many other Difficulties also to encounter; for the Money which his Brother had brought with him from France already began to fail, and there was no small Scarcity of Provisions occasioned by the heavy Rains which rendered their Conveyance by the Tesino very difficult, for the Boats were insufficient to bear up against the swelling Waters of the River, and were by no means capable of stemming the Violence of its Course.

PROSPERO at this Time having marched with all his Army out of Milan in order to approach Pavia, was prevented by the same Rains, and obliged to stop at Binasco in the Midway between Milan and Pavia, from whence he afterwards advanced to the Charterhouse, situated in the Park five Miles from Pavia, and the most beautiful Monastery perhaps in all Italy.

Italy. Lautrech, in Despair of taking A. D.
Pavia, drew off his Army and retired to 1522.
Landriano, without Molestation from the Enemy in his Decampment, except in some light Skirmishes. From Landriano he advanced to Moncia, for the better securing to himself a Sum of Money, which had been sent from France, and was lodged at Arona, because Anchise Visconti, who was sent from Milan to Busto near Arona on purpose to stop it, had prevented it from being forwarded.
 This Difficulty brought the Affairs of the French into the utmost Disorder ; for the Swiss, whose Pay had now been delayed for many Days, growing impatient according to Custom, sent their Officers to Lautrech with grievous Complaints that the Troops of their Nation, which had on all Occasions been lavish of their Blood for the Advancement of the Crown of France, should, contrary to all Justice, be reduced to Necessity for want of their due Payments ; and that such Avarice and Ingratitude were a Demonstration to all the World how little they were valued and esteemed for their Valour and Fidelity :

That it was their Resolution, since they had waited so many Days in vain, to tarry no longer in Expectation of any Term, nor trust to Promises which had been so often repeated, and as often failed. They were therefore absolutely determined to return to their Habitations, after they had first manifested to the World that they were not induced to this Resolution by a Fear of the Enemy who had taken the Field, nor from a Desire of avoiding the Dangers to which military Men are subject, and which they always despised, according to the well known Character of the Swiss, verified by so many Trials. They therefore signified to him that they were ready to fight a Battle the next Day with an Intention to depart the Day after: That he should lead them to find out the Enemy, and lay hold of the Opportunity given him by their Readiness, and put them in the Front of the Army. That they did not doubt that since they had with a much smaller Force than they had at present conquered the French Army in their Intrenchments near Novara, they should carry Victory with with them into the Camp of the Spaniards, ^{A. D.} who, tho' they excelled the French in art-^{1522.} ful Stratagems, and laying Snares, they did not imagine superior to them in the open Field, where the Fight was to be managed by Stoutness of Heart, and Force of Arms. Lautrech, considering how dangerous it was to go and attack the Enemy in their strong Camp endeavoured to moderate their Indignation, assuring them that the Supplies of Money were retarded not by any Neglect in the King, but from the Danger of the Conveyance, but that they would however certainly arrive within a very few Days. But neither his Authority nor Reasons, nor Prayers nor Promises were sufficient to convince or stop them. He determined therefore, especially as they were to be foremost in the Danger, rather to run the Hazard of a Battle under great Disadvantage, than absolutely ruine the War by refusing to fight, which, it was manifest, would be the Event, since the Swiss had resolved, if he did not comply, to decamp and be gone.

THE Enemy's Army was encamped at Bicocca, a Villa about three Miles distant from Milan, on which was a pretty large House surrounded with spacious Gardens, which were bounded by deep Ditches. The circumjacent Fields are full of Fountains and Rivulets, which have their Course directed, according to the Custom in Lombardy, for watering the Meadows. Towards this Place Lautrech marched with the Army, and judging that the Enemy who were so strongly posted would make a stout Defence, he ordered the Attack in the following Manner : The Swiss with the Artillery were to Assault the Front of the Camp, and the Artillery of the Enemy, which Post was guarded by the German Infantry under the Command of George Fronasperge : On the Left L'Escud with Three Hundred Lances and a Body of French and Italian Foot was directed to advance by the Way that leads from Milan towards the Bridge that gives an Entrance into the Enemy's Camp, and the General took upon himself the Charge of attempting to enter the Entrenchments in order to deceive the Enemy he ordered every Horſeman to put a red Croſs upon his Cloak which was the Mark of the Imperialiſts, inſtead of the white Croſs, which was the Badge of the French Army.

 On the other Side Proſpero Colonna, who Account, but with great Fierceness attacked the Ditch, and did all that was possible to pass it. At the same time L'Escud advancing to attack the Bridge found it so strongly guarded, contrary to his Expectations, that he was forced to retire. Prospero also quickly discovered the Artifice of Lautrech, and ordering his Men to put Twists of green Corn and Grass on the their Heads by that Means eluded his Stratagem. Hence the whole Brunt of the Battle was sustained by the Swiss, who from the Disadvantage of the Ground, and the Valour of the Defendants fatigued themselves to no Purpose, receiving very considerable Loss not only from those with whom they fought in Front, but from a large Body of Spanish Musqueteers, who being concealed among the Corn, which was almost ripe, terribly galled them in Flank, till at last they payed the Price of their Rashness with their Blood, being constrained to retreat with great Slaughter. They then joined the French, and all in a Body together with the Troops in Order, and with the Artillery, returned to Moncia, without out sustaining any Loss in their Retreat. A. D.

 The Marquis of Pescara and the other 1522.
 Generals were importunate with Prospero that since he saw the Enemy had turned their Backs he would give the Signal for the Troops to follow them; but the General believing, as the Truth was, that they retired in good Order, and not in manner of a Flight, and being the more assured of it by the Report of those who by his Orders had climbed some high Trees, constantly answered that he would not entrust again in the Power of Fortune the Victory which he had indisputably obtained, nor by his own Rashness cancel the Memory of that of others. “ Tomorrow, says he, will clearly manifest this Day's Work, for the Enemies being come to a better Feeling of their Wounds means we shall obtain without Danger forward to expose themselves to Danger, and among them two and twenty Officers. On the other Side very few were killed ; and no Person of Note except Giovanni di Cordona Count of Culifano, who received a Musquet Shot through his Helmet.

THE next Day Lautrech in Despair of Success, decamped from Moncia, in order to pass the River Adda near Trezzo, where the Swiss taking their Way through the Territory of Bergamo, returned to their Mountains, diminished in Number, but more in Boldness ; since it is certain that the Loss they received at Bicocca humbled them to that Degree that for several Years afterwards they did not shew their accustomed Vigour. At the same time departed also the Grand Ecuyer and Grand Master, and many other French Officers. Lautrech with the Men at Arms betook himself to Cremona, to give Orders for the Defence of that Town, where he left his Brother, and a few Days after passed the Mountains, carrying back to his King not Victories or Triumphs, but a Justification of himself and Complaints on others for the Loss of so fine a State, ^{A. D.} 1522. occasioned partly by his own Fault, partly through the Negligence and imprudent Counsels of those who were about the King, and partly, if Truth may be spoken *, by the Malignity of Fortune. Lautrech also, before he left Cremona, gave Orders to Bonneval and Federigo da Bozzolo to march with Six Troops of Men at Arms and a sufficient Number of Foot, and bestow themselves in Garrison at Lodi, a City which in the whole Course of the War had held out for the King. For the Cæsarean Generals had been prevented from immediately turning their Arms against that Place by a Mutiny of the German Foot which had attended Francesco Sforza from Trent. These Troops demanded a Donative of a Month's Wages as a Reward for the Victory, by which Act they required, as the Generals said, more than was their Due, for to defend one's self against an Assault, and to overcome the Aggressor are two different Cases; and it could not be said that the since they retired, not running away, but with their Troops in good Order, and saving their Artillery and Baggage. But the Insolence of the Germans prevailed over the Reasons and Authority of the Generals, who were constrained at last to consent, and to promise Payment within a certain Time. But several Days being spent in this Dispute, it happened that on the same Day in which the French Lances entered the City of Lodi, their Foot advancing behind, the Imperial Army with the Spanish Infantry in Front under Davalo approached the Place on the other Side before the French had taken their Posts, and while all Things were in a Hurry and Confusion, as it happens when Men at Arms first enter a Town in order to take up their Quarters. The Marquis of Pescara laying hold of the Opportunity with the utmost Speed assaulted a walled Suburb of the City, and carried it after a slight Defence, at which all the French that were in the City being terrified, because their Foot were not as yet entered, betook themselves to a disorderly Flight Flight towards the Bridge which they ^{A. FROM Lodi the Marquis marched to Pizzichitone which surrendered to him on Articles, and soon after Prospero with the whole Army passed the River Adda, in order to besiege Cremona; but he had no sooner approached that City than L'Escud inclined to come to an Agreement; for as he had no Hopes of maintaining himself but by the Coming of the Admiral, (whom the King, being desirous to preserve the Places that still held out for him in that State, had ordered for Italy with Four Hundred Lances, and Ten Thousand Foot) he might think that he had sufficiently provided for his Affairs if, without running himself into Danger, he could at his Leisure expect the Issue of that Offi-

D. 1522. cer's Arrival : And Prospero, on the other side, was desirous to make quick Dispatch of the Affair of Cremona that he might attempt the Restoration of the Brothers Adorni to Genoa before the Arrival of the Enemy's Succours in Italy. It was agreed therefore that L'Escud should in forty Days march out of Cremona with all his Men, their Colours flying, and with the Artillery, if within the said Time, which would end on the twenty-first of June, there did not arrive such Relief as should force their Way over the Po, and take one of the Cities of the State of Milan which should have a Garrison. He engaged also to procure then that all the Places held by the King in the Dutchy of Milan should be evacuated except the Castles of Milan, Cremona, and Novara, for the Observance of which Articles four Hostages were to be delivered; the Prisoners in the said Case were to be restored on each Side, and the French should have Leave granted them to pass with their Artillery and Effects without Molestation into France.

THE Agreement being concluded, and the Hostages received, the Cæſarean Army immediately marched towards Genoa, which was approached in two Places, the Marquis of Pescara with the Spanish and Italian Infantry encamping on the Side of the Codifaro, and Proſpero with the Men at Arms, and German Foot over againſt Biſagna. The City of Genoa was under the Government of Ottaviano Fregoso, a Prince certainly of moſt excellent Parts, and for his Juſtice and other ſignal Endowments as much beloved in that City as it is poſſible for a Prince to be beloved in a Town full of Factions, and in which the Memory of their antient Liberty was not worn out of the Minds of the People. He had in his Pay Two Thouſand Italian Foot, on which alone he depended for his Defence; for the Inhabitants of the City being divided into Parties, though they ſaw before their Walls ſo potent an Army of Soldiers of ſo many different Languages, they ſtood idle Spectators of the Progreſs of the Enterpriſe with the ſame Unconcern and Indifference with which in Times paſt they used to regard Turmoils of this Nature in which, without Danger or Damage to those who did not take up Arms, the public Authority was transfered from one Family to another, without the Appearance of an Alteration, except that in the Ducal Palace resided new Inhabitants, and new Officers and Soldiers kept Guard in the Square. At the first Approach of the Army to the Town the Doge immediately began to treat of an Agreement, and sent out to the Generals Benedetto Vivaldi a Genoese. But the Negotiation was in some Measure checked by the Arrival of Pietro Navarra, who being sent by the King of France with two light Gallies for the Security of Genoa entered the Port at the same time. But Davalo having begun to batter the Wall with the Artillery the Treaty for an Agreement was resumed with greater Earnestness, and now all Matters seemed to be settled, and no Difficulty remained, when the Spaniards, who had that Day battered a Tower near the Gate, the Garrison being negligent of their Guard, in Hopes, perhaps, of an Accommodation, seized on it, and partly through through that, and partly through the Breach in the Wall, began to enter the City, so that all that Part of the Army running thither, the Marquis. put his Troops in Order, and having sent Notice to Prospero of the Success, and giving the Signal, made his Way into the Town, where all the Soldiers and Citizens being intent some on flying, and others on shutting themselves up in their Houses, he met with no Resistance. The Archbishop of Salerno, and the Captain of the Guards, with many of the Citizens and Soldiers got on board the Ships, and put out to Sea; the Doge, who could not move because of his Infirmary, caused the Palace to be shut, and sent to surrender himself to the Marquis, in whose Custody not many Months after he died. Pietro Navarra was taken, and the whole Substance of the City became a Prey to the Conquerors. Many rich Families entered into Obligations some to one Company of Soldiers, and some to another, to pay them a great Sum of Money, for which they gave Security, either by Pawns, or Bills drawn upon Merchants, to save their Houses from

Plunder; by this Means was preserved the famous Bafon, which is kept with high Veneration in the Cathedral Church. The Plunder was inestimable in Plate, Jewels, Money, and costly Furniture, that City, by its extensive Trade and Merchandising, being full of infinite Riches. So great a Calamity, however, was the less deplorable in some Respects because through the Prayers of the Brothers Adorni, since the City had shewn no Sign of Hostility, and that an Agreement might be said to have been concluded, the Generals took Care that no Genoese should be made a Prisoner, and no Woman violated. Antoniotto Adorno was elected Doge, and as soon as the Army was marched away, with the Artillery lent him by the Florentines he laid Siege to the Castelletto; on the third Day he took the Citadel and the Church of San Francesco, and the Day after the Castelletto was surrendered to him on certain Conditions by the Governor.

THE Change in Genoa entirely deprived the King of France of all Hopes that it would be in his Power to send Succours

turned beyond the Mountains; and L'Escud, ^{French} though he had exceeded the Terms on ^{return to} which he had agreed by some Days, on ^{their own} account of the Difficulties that arose concerning the Fortresses of Trezzo, Lecco, and Domussolo, yet as soon as they were removed he returned with his Troops into France, the Allies not only keeping their Faith inviolate with him, but causing him to be honourably received and entertained in every Place through which he passed.

BUT in the mean time, while these Events happened in Lombardy, the Troubles of that Country with the Absence of the Pope, occasioned some Disturbances in Bologna, and much more in Tuscany. In ^{Attempt} Bologna, Annibale Bentivoglio in ^{on Bolog-} Con- ^{na fruitless} junction with Annibale Rangone, having privately got together about Four Thousand Men, approached the Town one Morning by Break of Day with three Pieces of Cannon on the Side of the Mountains, and in deep

A. D. 1522. deep Silence, without being heard by the Watch, many of them passed the Ditch, and set up the Ladders against the Walls. But the People within the Place having received some Intelligence of their Coming the Day before, gave a Shout when they saw a proper time, and beginning to fire the Cannon, and to sally out in great Numbers, they immediately betook themselves to Flight, leaving their Artillery, and amongst the Fugitives Annibale Rangone received a Wound in his Back Parts. It was almost taken for certain that the Cardinal de' Medici was privy to this Attempt, out of an Apprehension that the Pope, either of his own Head, or at the Instigation of others, would, as soon as he arrived in Italy, endeavour to diminish his Greatness, and therefore was desirous of such a Commotion in the Ecclesiastical State as must be excited by so great a Loss, that the Pontiff might not only be necessitated to employ himself on other Affairs without persecuting him, but also be constrained to have Recourse to his Counsel and Assistance.

BUT much more considerable and of longer Continuance were the Commotions ^{War in} and Dangers of Tuscany; for scarce was Tuscany the State of Siena secured from the Duke of Urbino, and the Affairs of Perugia and Montefeltro were hardly settled, when, by the Instigation of the Cardinal of Volterra, new Orders came from the King of France, that Renzo, who was then loitering away his Time in Idleness at Rome, should attempt a Revolution in the State of Florence, by restoring to that City the Brothers and Nephews of the Cardinal of Volterra, who with all his Family were declared the Friends and Confederates of the King. The Expences necessary for the Expedition, the King at that Time being in great Straits for Want of Money, were to be defrayed by the Cardinal who received a Promise from the King to be reimbursed within a certain Term. While Renzo was preparing to put himself in Motion, the Affair coming to the Knowledge of the Cardinal de' Medici, his Fears that the Duke of Urbino should also make some Movement obliged him to enter into an Agreement

A. D.

Agreement that, without Prejudice to the Right which the Florentines and the Duke claimed to the Towns of Montefeltro, the Duke should be Captain General of the Florentine Forces, for one Year certain, and for another Year at Pleasure, and take upon him the Command the Beginning of the next September. For the same Reasons the Florentines took into their Service Oratio Baglioni, but on Condition that his Pay should not begin till the Month of June, because till that Time he was engaged to the Venetians. This Agreement was also made in the Name of his Brother Malatesta, but was never ratified by him, because he had before received Money for joining Renzo da Ceri with Two Thousand Foot and an Hundred light Horse, and was neither willing openly to forfeit his Honour, nor on the other hand to provoke, by a new Offence, the Enmity of the Cardinal and of the Florentines. Wherefore feigning himself sick, he sent Word to Renzo, who was arrived at Castel della Pieve with Two Thousand Foot, an Hundred light Horse, and four Falconets, excusing himself for not waiting on him in Person

Person on account of his Indisposition: A. D.

And he put the Cardinal in Hopes that he ^{1522.} would take no more Money of the Enemies, but ratify the Agreement made for his entering into their Service, as soon as the Term for which he had been paid was expired, and that in the mean time he would proceed with all possible Moderation on those Enterprises in which he could not refuse to act on account of the Money that he had received. After this Renzo with Five Hundred Horse and Seven Thousand Foot entered the Territory of Siena, attended by the same Exiles who had followed the Duke of Urbino, in order to attempt a Change in that Government, in which if he should succeed he did not doubt but to open himself a Way through that State into the Bowels of the Florentine Dominions, and obtain the same Success in Florence. But on the other side the Florentines foreseeing the Danger, and desirous that the Enemy should not approach Siena, had sent all their Troops into the Territory of the Senese under Guido Rangone, who on that urgent Occasion was elected Captain General of the Army.

His

A. D. His Intention was by all Means to temporise with the Enemies, and make them lose their Time, since he knew that if they met with no prosperous Success in the Beginning they would soon come to want Money, and at the same time he endeavoured as much as possible to cut them short of Provisions. Wherefore regulating his Motions according to the Progress of the Enemy, he attended to the Defence of those Towns that lay nearest to the Dominions of the Senese and Florentines, sometimes in one Quarter sometimes in another, in which shifting of the Soldiers from Place to Place it happened that Vitello's Regiment of Horse marching from Torrito to Asinalunga fell in with Three Hundred Horse of the Enemy, who charged and broke them, taking Girolamo de' Pepoli, Vitello's Lieutenant, with Five and Twenty Men at Arms Prisoners, and carrying off two Colours.

of Renzo
da Ceri.

THE first Enterprize of Renzo de Ceri was directed against the City of Chiusi, a Place more remarkable for its Antiquity, and the famous Exploits of its King Por-senna, senna, than for its present State; but A. D.

being baffled in his Attempt because he had no other Artillery than four Falconets, which made it very difficult for him to become Master of Towns when garrisoned by regular Troops, he advanced more forwards between Torrta and Asindunga, in order to approach Siena. But having in the Midst of hostile Towns no Conveniency of Provisions, he made an Attempt by Storm on the Castle of Torrta, which had a Garrison of One Hundred Men at Arms of Count Guido Rangone, and about Fifteen Hundred Foot. From hence being repulsed he decamped and pursued his March to Montelifre, and from thence to Bagno a Rapolano, twelve Miles distant from Siena, in which City the Florentines had at the Beginning of these Movements, placed Count Pitigliano as Governor. But Count Guido by his good Intelligence and Speed disconcerting all his Measures, entered the same Day into Siena with Two Hundred light Horse, leaving behind him the Army, which followed him without stopping. Wherefore the Succours being so near at Hand, and Renzo having lost much of his Reputation in this Expedition among those of his own Party as well as with his Enemies, and it being well known that he was reduced to great Straits for Want of Provisions, the Malecontents in Siena who wanted a Change of Government were greatly dejected. Renzo however approached within Half a Mile of the Walls. But all Things remaining quiet in the Place without the least Commotion, he went off after staying a Day, and after his Departure the Troops of the Florentines on the same Day entered Siena; and tho' they put themselves in Pursuit of him, yet despairing to overtake him, because he was so far advanced, they left him to be pursued only by some light Horse, and a certain Number of Foot which were in Siena before, and which did him but little Damage. But Renzo marched with such Speed, his Pace being quickened perhaps by Hunger as much as by Fear, that he left his Artillery on the Road; which, to his great Disgrace, came into the Power of the Enemy. He stopped at Acquapendente, in order to recruit his his Forces, which were greatly diminished, being perfectly secure because he knew that the Florentine Troops would forbear out of Respect to enter the Dominions of the Church. But as he wanted Money, and the Cardinals of Volterra, of Monte, and of Como, with whom, by Order of the King of France he concerted his Measures, began to neglect him, he betook himself with those few Troops he had left to ravage the maritime Parts belonging to Siena, where he gave an Assault to Orbitello, but was repulsed. Wherefore the Florentines, who had advanced with their Army as far as the Bridge of Centina, on the Borders of the State of Siena and of that of the Church, finding that Renzo did not disband all his Forces, threatened to attack the Towns of the Ecclesiastic Dominions. On this the College of Cardinals, who were uneasy at seeing the Flames of this Combustion likely to get Hold of the Ecclesiastical State, interposed for making an Agreement, which was equally acceptable to both Parties: To the Florentines because it eased them of those Expences

A. D. from which they reaped no manner of 1522. Advantage; to Renzo da Ceri because he Peace found himself but slenderly provided, and concluded without Hopes of assembling greater Forces, especially as the French Interest was on the Decline in Lombarby. The Convention contained no other Articles than only a Promise between the Sanese and Florentines on one Side, and Renzo on the other, to commit no Hostilities against each other, for the Performance of which Security was given in Rome of Fifty Thousand Ducats, and as to the Plunder that had been taken both Parties referred themselves to the Declaration of the Pope after his Arrival in Italy.

THE same Winter happened a dangerous Accident in Lucca; for Vicenzo di Poggio, of a noble Family, and Lorenzo Totti, under Colour of private Differences, but incited perhaps much more by Ambition and Poverty, took up Arms, and assassinated the Gonfalonier of that City in the public Palace, and afterwards ranging over the Town murdered some other Citizens who were their Adversaries, creating creating so universal a Terror that none A. D. 1522. had the Courage to oppose them. However when the first Fury was abated, those who had terrified others began to be under Apprehensions for their own Safety, considering the Heinousness of the Facts they had committed, and many of the Citizens interposing their Mediation they agreed to leave the City on certain Conditions, and after their Departure met with most bitter Persecutions wherever they went.

THE Affairs of Lombardy and Tuscany were now restored to a State of Tranquillity as above related, but the Care of the Dominions of the Church being totally neglected by the College through the Absence of the Pope, and the Discord and Ambition of the Cardinals, Sigismondo Son of Pandolfo Malatesta the ancient Lord of Rimini, by means of some flight Correspondence which he held in the Place, seized on that City almost without any Assistance: And tho' the Cardinal de' Medici, at the Instances of the College, had taken a Journey to Bologna as Legate of that City, in order to fusion, having obtained a Promise from the College that the Marquis of Mantoua, General of the Church, should march to his Assistance, yet nothing took Effect for Want of Money, and because the Cardinals his Adversaries prevented every Resolution which might tend to increase his Reputation.
